On the 20th the fighting Allies made further gains against the stubbornly resisting and steadily strengthened enemy, but the successes between the Aisne and the Marne were the least of the day's victories, for, forced to divert his storm troops to the uses of defense on his right flank, the enemy had no troops with which to continue his offensive toward Epernay. The morning of this day saw the Germans hurriedly retiring across the Marne, hard pressed by the French and American troops, which on the 18th, while the drive was being started further west, had here also fought the Germans to a standstill. By the evening of the 20th there were no Germans except dead and prisoners south of the river the name of which now for the second time stands for German defeat.

General March, Chief of Staff of the American Army, made known, on July 20th, the identity of the divisions concerned in the victorious counter-offensive. He said there were seven divisions and one separate regiment—the latter a negro regiment—about 270,000 "Yanks," in the big push. The 42d or Rainbow Division was in the fighting east of Rheims, as was the negro regiment. On the Western leg of the Marne salient, in the drive eastward were the 1st, 2d, 3d and 4th Regular Divisions and the 26th and 28th National Guard Divisions.

THE 20th was a day of defeat for Germany all along the line, from north of Soissons—which was more closely enveloped during the day—past Chateau Thierry, along the Marne to west of Epernay and northward to Rheims. The Germans between the Marne and Rheims were steadily pushed back, losing half of their three days' gains of July 15th to 18th, the French retaking Marfaux, which had been reached by the Germans on the 15th, while east of Rheims, the French between Souain and Auberive advanced over 1,000 yards. Meanwhile, the French and American artillery and aviators were making the whole territory within the Marne salient most uncomfortable for the Germans. By evening of the 20th the French-American front was established on a line averaging about five miles eastward of the line of attack of the 18th.

JULY twenty-first, the eighty-seventh anniversary of Belgian Independence, was a day of German defeat and retreat. German reserves, 100,000 strong, were thrown violently into action on the western side of the salient from Soissons to the Oureq, while equally determined resistance was made on the eastern side, from Vignay south through Marfaux to the woods of Roi. Here English troops with the French and Italians were pressing forward, driving a wedge south of Rheims to meet the advancing wedge south of Soissons. They had twenty-five miles to in the midst of a barrage fire which swept the ground for which they were heading.

Up to Tuesday, July 23, it was estimated that more than 25,000 prisoners had been taken by the Allies, with at least 560 cannon and an immense number of machine-guns and other war material; some reports said 1000 cannon had been taken.

MONDAY, July 22, was a day of tremendous fighting along the 100-mile line from Soissons around the salient to Rheims and eastward past Massiges. Retreating from Chateau-Thierry, the enemy took position on a line of hills running from near Oulchy through Grissoles, Bezu, the Bois, de Barbillon to Mont St. Pere on the Marne, northeast of Fossoy. From this line he counter-attacked with picked Prussian storm troops against the advancing Americans and French. With German guns again in position back of this new line, and the Allied guns following closely the infantry advance, the artillery battle was again at full intensity, and roads, back areas and concentration points were all under fire. But neither the Prussians nor the Germans could stop the Allies, who pressed forward with the cry upon their lips: "The Boche is not coming back this way!" Against this will to victory, the Prussians balanced their own slogan "We will win the war or all go to hell!" They did not come back that way, although some 100,000 of them died in the attempt.

The hard-pressed Crown Prince received some divisions of reinforcements on the 21st and 22d from the armies of Crown Prince Rupprecht of Bavaria, facing the British in Picardy and Flanders. This movement was answered and countered by the sending of British division to the front, southwest of Rheims, where they were in action on the 22d, meeting furious counter-attacks of picked German divisions. The net result of the day's fighting was the complete defeat of all the German assaults. The Americans pressed forward slightly south of Soissons and advanced about a mile from Oulchy to the Marne against the new German line. Oulchy was taken on July 23d.

Along the Marne from Chartrèves to near Reully the Germans were still in force on the north bank, and resisted bitterly every French attempt to cross in pursuit. East and west of this section, however, the French and American troops crossed, using the Germans' own pontoons and footbridges, which they had not had time to destroy, and constructing others under fire.

Northward from the Marne to Rheims the battle raged all day with fluctuating fortunes. The village of Marfaux was at one time partly in German hands, but the evening saw all previous Allied gains maintained and slight progress made westward.

Everywhere back of the lines south of the Vesle the retreating Germans were burning villages and ammunition dumps and supply depots; indicating a situation constantly becoming more desperate and apparently a plan to make a stand along the Vesle. Meantime the German advance toward Paris moved rapidly toward the rear, and the Allied armies, gaining impetus and morale and assurance of victory, became hourly more formidable. The spirit of democracy, aroused, was out to conquer.

AMID all the excitement of the Allied offensive, our American troops have not only acquired a new and valuable experience, but they have learned to know something of the importance of strategy. General Foch is now a hero in their eyes.

Our troops have also confirmed the "hunch" they and their leaders have had from the start, that they are equal to any troops on the field when it comes to actual work. They have now faced the very pick of the German army, shock troops included.

How the German military leaders view the situation is not announced, although an article in the Cologne Gazette gives an intimation of their attitude. The Gazette says that the aim of the General Staff in crossing the Marne has been attained, and that the withdrawal was for the "protection of life, in order to be strong as possible on the decisive part of the front."

go to unite the wedges. The Allies captured and held Bouilly and St. Euphrase and forced their way forward in the wooded country to the southward.

While the Germans were attacking desperately against the jaws of General Foch's very von-Mackensen-like pincers, they were hurriedly withdrawing south of the Oureq and from before Epernay. The withdrawal began south of the Marne on Friday night, masked by a smoke cloud and fierce rear-guard actions. It spread both westward and eastward so that on Saturday night the last German had left Chateau-Thierry and the country northwest and east of it, while the lines near Epernay were drawn in appreciably from Venteuil toward Chatillon. Northwest of Chateau-Thierry the allied advance averaged two miles in depth as far as the Oureq, where the progress carried our forces from Neuilly almost to Oulchy. By evening of the 21st, the Allies were in touch with or across the Soissons-Chateau-Thierry highway along its entire length. The Allies were also on the north bank of the Marne from Chateau-Thierry as far east as Fossoy.

ALL accounts of the fighting show that at many points it became practically a rout. The German rear-guard at different stages fought almost to the last man while endeavoring to cover the retreat. Although the larger portion of the German reserves had been sent into the fight, even the Crown Prince's picked troops were unable to halt the impetuous Allied advance along the whole twenty-eight-mile front. The incessant pounding of field and aerial artillery at so many points seemed to take the heart out of the Kaiser's army. Surrenders were frequent and in many cases whole companies yielded in the face of what seemed to be certain annihilation.

The spirit of the Americans was indomitable and irresistible. At every point where they came in contact with the enemy, they drove the Huns before them, and all attempts on the part of the Crown Prince's generals to rally their forces to check the advance of the Americans were swept aside. Correspondents who were eyewitnesses of the American advance unite in stating that every movement was well organized and the system worked well from one end of the line to the other. Even those units whose participation in the Allied offensive was their first baptism of fire behaved like veterans. Upgrade and down-grade, through woods and valleys they went, sometimes preceded by tanks; at others

A Czech Army to Fight in France

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

WE were in Field, British Columbia, when my eye caught the headline, "Czecho-Slovaks and Soviet Troops Meet." The report went on to say that there had been fighting between these two forces in the region of the Urals.

These Czecho-Slovaks are the greatest bunch of political and military dynamite I have ever met! From the time they kidnapped me in the crowded station at Irtyshevo, between Saratov and Moscow, till I waved "good-by" to a group of them as our little boat put out from Vladivostok, I grew to love them like brothers.

I know of no troops who, under similar conditions, have kept up such a fine spirit and maintained self-respect, discipline and enthusiasm in the midst of demoralization and chaos. They are upstanding, fighting men, and that is why Trotzky and Lenine did all they could to get them out of Russia.

My friend, Mr. Miller of the Y. M. C. A., who knows the Czechs thoroughly, said to me one night in Samara: "People don't know the Czechs. That's why they said that we could never get them to France by carrying them around the world. But two échelons are already in Vladivostok, and we are putting four thousand men through here a day now."

Now the Czecho-Slovaks are very important people in this war. What they may do to Austria and so to their hated German oppressors has yet to be developed. Liberty is as dear to them now as it was when Huss started his reformation and they insisted on the full communion and the open Bible. And there are no men anywhere who are staking more and using more initiative and heroism to achieve liberty, than these people of whom so little is known.

IT was known that the Czechs would never fight their brother Slavs. Forty per cent. of German and Magyar troops were included in all Czech battalions. In spite of this, in small groups and in whole companies, with bands at their heads, the Czechs marched across to the Serb, Italian and Russian lines, voluntary prisoners rather than murderers of men with whom they had no quarrel. For this, they are still criticized.

Mutiny broke out and thousands of Czechs sacrificed their lives to an ideal. The German and Magyar troops used Prussian methods to compel an allegiance which was not their due, and had never been freely pledged. For every Czech who went over to the enemy, two were killed at home. Yet they preferred death to being made tools of oppression against their blood-brothers. These men, accused of cowardice, tried in every way to gain places in the Serbian, Russian and Italian armies and distinguished themselves for physical courage as they had for moral courage in refusing to be instruments of autocratic oppression.

Those Czechs who were outside Austria when war broke out offered themselves as loyal soldiers in the Allied fight. As "alien enemies" some of them are now serving in the British artillery, a high compliment to their loyalty and intelligence. The Czechs and their brothers the Slovaks realize too well the futility of idealistic words without active sacrifice and service, and they are doing their bit in the fight to make the world a place where the political lion and the lamb shall lie down in peace together.

On arriving at Irtyshevo fresh from Armenia, I noticed great groups of soldiers in the Russian uniform, but with a red and white badge on their caps. They were neat, alert, enthusiastic. One could see at a glance that they were going somewhere and not retreating. Their faces shone with a spirit which I had never seen in the Russian soldier—a spirit which graft, corruption and Tsarism killed in the Russians before I entered Russia. I wondered who they could be. The Red part of their ribbon made me wonder if they were the boasted Red Army. If they were, I foresaw a sturdy defense against German trickery and force. In broken Russian I asked who they were. The reply came first in French and then in English. I told them I was an American, and from that time on I was their willing prisoner and guest.

The grounds around their cars were swept up and tidy. The floors of their cars were clean, as were their uniforms. All this in Russia. I marveled and admired. It was new and inspiring.

I was told by my friend Mr. Spacek, member of the Narodni Rada, that the percentage of literacy among the Czecho-Slovaks was ninety-seven per cent. Nearly every man I met could read, write and talk at least three languages, and some talked six languages and many dialects. I taught English to a large group fighting. Had the entire Seventh Army been made up of Czechs, the leaders said they would have taken Lemberg. But neither Cossacks, Siberians nor the British armored car division surpassed the Czechs in bravery, discipline or morale.

When, in February, Russia withdrew from the war, the Czechs asked permission to leave for France, via Siberia and Vladivostok. Such a group of well disciplined men in Russia might prove a danger to the Bolsheviks, and Lenine and Trotzky were glad to do all they could to get them out of the country. When I reached their staff headquarters at Penza, the Czecho-Slovaks were moving out at the rate of four échelons in twenty-four hours, although trains were scarce and travelers were many.

All along the line they were forced to give up their supplies. Airplanes, armored cars, rifles and cartridges melted away under the successive demands of the local Soviets in the districts through which they passed. But no one opposed their progress. They had mounted machine-guns on their engines while coming out of the Ukraine, and had gotten the best of their opponents in several bloody skirmishes. In confused Russia there was no one anxious to stop these disciplined troops of brave men. The Trans-Siberian became a thoroughfare for Czech trains en route to Vladivostok. We were almost keeping up to passenger schedule.

Sturdy Czecho-Slovak troops on the march in Siberia of the Narodni Rada, and their intelligence violated all speed laws.

AS I lent a copy of "The Crisis" to one soldier, who had been a waiter in a London hotel, I told him I hoped he would enjoy it, as it was a story of Lincoln. His reply was immediate and sincere: "Thank you very much. I have always had a very great interest in the character of Abraham Lincoln and in the principles which were fought for in the American War of Secession."

As artists, the Czechs have power, imagination and superb technique. Their sketches showed the pride and manhood of the Czech soldier, who has gone through all the demoralizing experiences that have ruined the Russians, but has come through clean and sound. In a dozen towns and cities, I have seen the Czech soldiers walking, resting and playing, and I have never seen one disgrace his red-and-white badge of honor.

The Czechs are musical. To hear the marching songs of the Russian soldiers in Petrograd was inspiring. But the Czechs have more than music in their singing—they have a challenge and a promise. The Czechs sing as though they were creating a Marseillaise and not simply repeating it. Czech music, whether it be the marching song among the box-cars, or the violin solo in the Red Cross car among the wounded, is like that.

I WISH I could tell more about the good times we had together, and of how I saw an expeditionary force of forty thousand men increase to sixty thousand, like a great snowball rolling across Siberia on its way to France.

But doubtless you will want to know, as that man at Field wanted to know, why the Czecho-Slovaks are fighting the Soviets in the Urals. When they came over to the Russians, the Czechs, because of German influence under the old régime, were denied their dream of fighting with Russia against their old oppressors. Instead, they were sent to malarial districts in Turkestan and to cold Siberia. But when the Revolution came, banners bearing Bohemian insignia appeared as if by magic; Czech regiments formed in a moment and the Czecho-Slovaks took a distinguished part in the ineffectual Russian offensive and retreat of July 1917. Under General Selivatcheff who succeeded General Belkovich, the Czechs pierced six enemy lines and then covered the enforced retreat near Zborov. In that sector they bore the brunt of the

IN Siberia the authority rests in Soviets manned by Jews and supported by a mercenary army of Austrian prisoners of war, Cossacks, Russians and a few German war prisoners. And Siberia neither wished to have Semenoff start a reactionary movement nor give Japan an excuse for aggression. It was believed that France favored intervention in Siberia, and it was known that France was financing the Czechs. To have any considerable number of Czechs in the region of Semenoff's army at the time when the Siberian Soviets were trying to repulse him was manifestly a danger to the Soviets, so no more échelons left Irkutsk. The excuse was floods on the Amur and the poor condition of the sand track of the Amur railway. But the real reason was that, with Russia uncertain as to the attitude of France, England and Japan, the Soviets saw no reason for allowing those who were being financed by France in the Tchita region.

Thus it was that an intervention scare kept trained and brave fighters from proceeding to Vladivostok, whence they would go via Panama or America to France. Archangel was the only one other way out.

But meanwhile there were rumors that a boundary would be established between Russia and Siberia along the Urals. Not only did this threaten Lenine and Trotzky with a further dismemberment of the empire, but with the Germans holding the pistol to the heads of the Russian Bolshevik authorities, any anti-German move in the Urals would be a provocation for further German aggression in Russia.

OBVIOUSLY, the best thing was to disarm the Czechs. But, just as obviously, the Czechs objected to being utterly disarmed in an unfriendly country. And just as obviously Lenine and Trotzky are mighty anxious to get these seventy thousand brave men out of the country. Twelve thousand are already in Vladivostok or have left for France in care of a fine group of Red Triangle men. The rest are scattered from Irkutsk to Archangel, and rumor has it that the Germans have closed the latter port, so that this eager array of men, may be kept in Russia until Semenoff quits his provocative warfare in Siberia or the Czech ammunition gives out.

If a regiment or more of the Czechs comes to America on its way to France, you will miss the chance of your life if you don't hear them sing, see them drill and then cheer them on their long, long trail from the Austrian mobilization centers of four years ago to the prison camps of Russia, and the trenches in France, in their spirited and determined fight against oppression and in behalf of liberty.

IF I had been St. Francis, I would certainly have addressed a sermon to the Weeds. It was all very well for him to preach to the birds, especially since all the pictures show how attentive were his feathered brethren. Nor do I wonder that St. Anthony exhorted his brother fishes, because the people of Rimini would not listen to him. It must be so, for they have commemorated the fact by building a chapel on the banks of a canal near the Rubicon, to the preacher and his "Brother Fish." There have been many fishermen preachers, but only one preacher to fish, and he surely deserves his piscine chapel.

Many preachers doubtless have wished that they had even fish to turn to, from an unresponsive audience. But in none of their voluminous biographies have I read that either of these saints preached to the weeds, as I am often tempted to do since I feel that my kinship with them is so close.

If a preacher can exhort effectively only those whose tendencies and temptations he has himself known, most of us are particularly qualified to address our brother weeds. It is a wise homiletical rule to preach ad hominem, and to let your auditors know that you sympathize with them and understand their peculiarities.

MY sermon to Weeds would be something as follows:

Beloved Brethren, we, your fellow mortals, have much in common with you. In the morning we flourish and grow up; in the evening we are cut down and wither. Our brief day is but a little longer than yours. Indeed, it may be shorter, for some of you, I note, are perennials, and very loath to die, while our days are numbered from the beginning.

I notice, too, that most of you are very persistently bent on taking the wrong course, and in this respect, too, we acknowledge our kinship.

Brother Burdock, you have long and exceedingly tough roots. I sometimes think they are clinched on the other side of the globe. You are much inclined to spring up in our lawns where you are not wanted. Alas, our own evil propensities are just as deep-rooted; and when we think we have cut off the evil thing, and believe that it will trouble us no more, we soon find that we have but clipped the top of our passions and that their roots stretch down into the depths of our being.

Brother Pussley, you, too, have the same faults, and I find you among my peas and in my strawberry-bed, where your room is far better than your company. But, how can we reproach you for persistently crowding out your betters, when we find that with our own best thoughts and actions, evil is mixed. Into our prayers sometimes intrude wandering thoughts. I fear that some of us gave an extra five dollars to the hospital because, though it was more than we could afford, our name had to appear on a subscription paper and we could not drop our contributions into the anonymous seclusion of a contribution box.

AND you, too, brother Poison Ivy, even with you we must claim kinship, however unwillingly. Like many a bad habit, you are quite bewitchingly beautiful in your early days. In the spring you put forth your three finely-veined and tinted leaves, and twine lovingly about any support you may find. If you find none, you stand upright and independent. But how you do multiply yourself, sending out far-reaching roots, stretching in every direction, until the ground is a perfect network of your fibres. You strangle every delicate thing to which you attach yourself, and poison some people who do but breathe the same atmosphere as you do.

Many of us know your prototype too well. Those little bad habits, begun when we were boys! What a lot of trouble they gave us before they were rooted out! We are not sure yet that their virus is dead. The harmless, pretty little thing at the beginning—mere good fellowship, harmless conviviality, it seemed, but it strangled a life and poisoned a whole family when it was grown. Moreover, you sow your evil seeds at the same time that you stretch your runners underground, until you have a million children, and many square rods of my farm are covered with your noxious growth.

I cannot deny it—the sins of us mortals multiply in very much the same way. One leads to another and another and another, until the good soil of human nature that was meant to grow virtues and good deeds, is often preoccupied with a rank and poisonous moral vegetation.

BROTHER Witch-grass, I must not forget to reprobate you. How innocent you look when your first green shoot appears above the brown soil of spring-time! You would deceive the very elect, for you look exactly like your succulent brother, Huds-grass, but if we let you grow, your tangle of roots and worthless shoots will choke every decent plant in the neighborhood.

There are others of your tribe which give me a lot of trouble, and yet I do not like to class them with Brother Poison Ivy and Brother Burdock and Brother Witch-grass. I refer to you, Brothers Daisy and Buttercup and Dandelion. You are very pretty and not without your uses, I admit. You brighten a field and are quite as exquisite in your way as many of the flowers we cultivate and cherish. But you have the vice of overdoing your virtues and obtruding them where they are not wanted.

You, Brother Daisy, get into the mowing grass and then you become a White-weed and we farmers have little patience with you. You, Brother Buttercup, do the same thing and spoil next winter's fodder; and as for you, Brother Dandelion, you are the pest of our lawns.

Yet we cannot reproach you too severely, when we remember how our own virtues tend to vices. We think they are "daisies," and so they are; but they sometimes get so rampant as to choke out other and more important virtues. They lead us to the sins we have no mind to.

Often they get into our neighbor's fields, and they hide all his special merits, so that we cannot see them ourselves, while we become a nuisance to him, and he wishes we were farther away.

Neatness is most admirable, yet a good wife's fear of a speck of dirt on the kitchen floor often makes the men folks uncomfortable. Self-sacrifice is one of man's noblest virtues; but when it develops into a self-imposed, life-long martyrdom, it is worse than buttercups in the mowing patch. Executive ability is indispensable in its place, but when it undertakes to regulate everyone's actions, it is as much out of place as a crop of dandelions on the front lawn.

WELL, Brother Weeds, I know of but one way to keep you where you belong, and that is to fill your places with a useful growth. I have noticed that Peas and Parsley, like everything else, obey the law of the impenetrability of matter. They cannot occupy the same spot at the same time. I can cultivate Beans or Burdocks, but not both in the same garden patch, for you, Brother Burdocks, will strangle Brother Beans, unless we see to it that they have the right of way. We can raise your great family, Brother Witch-grass, without half trying, for you have ten million children, but we prefer Brother Timothy and Brother Red-Top, and we will see to it that they shall flourish in our acres, and their moral kinfolk in the gardens of our souls.

An Inscription for A Wayside Altar

HE walked the dusty ways of men,
Their grief and hunger knew,
The weariness of journey long,
Love's greeting and adieu.

He found the lowly roads of earth,
If trod with spirit true,
Reach havens o'er the kindly stars—
His road runs here for you!

DAILY MEDITATION

Reverend
E. W. Caswell
and
Prof. W. H. T. Dau

The Open Door

SUNDAY, August 4. Rev. 3:8. "I have set before thee an open door." The life that is lived in steady contemplation of God is not only firm and roomy, but is characterized by daily enlargement. Every day the Lord opens doors to the consecrated life. Words that hitherto had no meaning throw open their doors and unveil their wealth. Promises, that have hitherto been under lock and key, fling their doors ajar, and invite us to partake of their treasure. We don't know just where we shall find the open door. Sometimes a lowly service confronts us. We discharge the humble task, and in the act of obedience we find we have passed through an open door into an enlarged conception of "the inheritance of the saints in light."

In the old castle at Edinburgh, the way to the crown jewels leads through a very humble doorway and through a very dingy and circuitous passage. The humble doorways of common duties are frequently the way to the room where God keeps his jewels.

The Lord is ever giving us new opportunities, fresh chances, that day by day we may grow in grace and in the knowledge of him. It is his will that we should grow daily in finer discernment, richer affection, and more brilliant hope.

Let us "set the Lord" always before us, and life in its inmost depths shall be wondrously transfigured. We shall step upon rock, we shall live in a large place, and life will be abundant in opportunities for moral and spiritual growth.

The Nearness of the Invisible

MONDAY, August 5. II Kings 6:17. "And Elisha prayed, and said, 'Lord, I pray thee, open his eyes, that he may see.' And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw; and behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha." Elisha did not summon the armies of the skies to come to his relief—they were already round about him. The spiritual world is vastly nearer to us than we know. We forget what God's resources are.

The line which separates the natural from the supernatural is a very narrow one. Spiritual forces surround us on every side. The universe is full of power, and the power is of God. Jacob saw a heavenly ladder with angels ascending and descending. Then surely, if angels were going both ways, some of the angels were on earth all the time! Invisible are the forces of the air that lift oceans into the skies. Invisible are such immeasurable agencies as electricity and gravitation.

The wonderful progress of material science is marked by our increasing knowledge of means to apply the power which is already at our hand. God's resources of grace are as boundless as his messengers and ministers of power. We are often unduly alarmed. Notwithstanding God's abundant promises, we fear he may forget us. Nothing is plainer than that God promises to take care of his children. The high mountain shall be leveled and a way shall be cleft straight through the sea for our feet.

The allegory of Bunyan's pilgrim who saw lions in the way and was afraid, but pressed on and found the lions chained so that he could pass in safety, is entirely true to human experience. Elisha's servant thought it was necessary to do something in order to escape. It was only necessary that the young man's eyes should be opened to see that God had already done everything that was necessary for the safety of his servants. "Ye fearful saints, fresh courage take."

The Kingdom Within

TUESDAY, August 6. Luke 17:20, 21. "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation; neither shall they say, Lo, here! or, Lo there! for behold, the kingdom of God is within you." The "kingdom of God" and the Church are kindred terms. Both are names which the Scriptures apply to the believers, viewed in their totality. This Church is not the visible society to which we often apply that name, and membership in this Church is determined not by certain religious performances.

The Pharisees, leaders of the faith in the days of Christ, had that conception of the Church. And if at any time that conception seemed justifiable it was in those days. For the Jewish Church was founded as a theocracy; for the people of the Jews as a visible society God had made special laws and ordinances.

But it is remarkable that even in this Church God declared that external compliance with its ways did not constitute any one a true member of the Church. He told the Jews by Isaiah: "To this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word. He that killeth an ox is as if he slew a man; he that sacrificeth a lamb, as if he cut off a dog's neck; he that offereth an oblation, as if he offered swine's blood; he that burneth incense, as if he blessed an idol." Here God abominates the mere outward performance of acts of worship as an outrage and a crime that is perpetrated against his holy name. Repeating a saying of this same prophet, our Lord said to the members of the Jewish Church in his day on another occasion: "Ye hypocrites, well did Isaiah prophesy of you, saying, This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoreth me with their lips; but their heart is far from me. In vain do they worship me."

The Pharisees with whose false notions of the Church our Lord wrestled have had many followers, who think and speak of the Church as a great, powerful, visible organization in this world, subject to the supreme will of a visible ruler, and capable of being employed in great worldly enterprises like a political machine. The Pharisees expected the Lord to set up such a church, and with the remark which has been cited at the head of this lesson the Lord sought to disabuse their ambitious minds of their pet notion. "The kingdom of God is within you," that means, faith which only God sees, constitutes any person a member of the Church. "The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his. And, Let every one that nameth the name of the Lord depart from iniquity."

Forgiveness of Sins

WEDNESDAY, August 7. Luke 5:23. "Whether it is easier, to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee, or to say, Rise up and walk." All the forces of matter and spirit are in God's hands. He who is true in nature, giving day and night, summer and winter, heat and cold, will be true in the government of His eternal kingdom.

Nothing whatever is hard to do, with the Infinite I AM. Christ proved his power to forgive sin by healing the body of the invalid. Physical miracles were evidences of his greater spiritual healing. All power belongeth unto God. Every work is easy for him. Whether it be easier to say "Let there be light," or to say, "Let there be love," what he says will be done. His promises will be kept. With him there is no shadow of turning. Our anchor upon the Rock of Ages always holds; amid all the changes of time, he is the same, yesterday, today and forever. He can touch the body into health and the soul into beauty. He is able to deliver, almighty to save.

If the sun had ever failed us, we might distrust the Son of Righteousness; if nature was ever untrue, we might doubt the grace divine. Our Lord could not prove that the sins of the paralytic were forgiven, but he could prove that bodily healing lay in his power.

No human physician could have healed the crippled man. Each kind of cure testified to the other in the experience of the sick man. The onlookers might do as they pleased about accepting the apparent fact that Christ was God in man, working wonders. They thought it blasphemy for Jesus to declare the man forgiven, because they knew that only God could forgive sins. They were amazed at the bodily healing whether they believed in the spiritual transformation or not.

This God is the God we adore,
Our faithful unchangeable Friend,
Whose love is as great as His power,
And neither knows measure nor end.

Saved by Hope

THURSDAY, August 8. Rom. 8:24. "For we are saved by hope." Does it never strike us as strange that Jesus, who was the world's supreme Sufferer, was also the world's supreme Optimist? Paul followed closely in his Lord's footsteps, summing up his life of bitterness and pain with that magnificent sentence, "Experience worketh hope."

The Scriptures tell us that Jesus, on the same night that he was betrayed, joined with his disciples in singing. Life was finished, but hope was not—hope which like an eagle rose above the shadows of the olives, above the bleak hill with its three crosses, above the darkened sun, to the throne of the Father.

The years bring to us all toils and trials, but life's close may find faith strengthened by every shock and blow. The sturdiest oak is that which sinks its anchors into granite hills and bares its branches to the mountain storms. An apostle prays, "The God of all grace . . . after ye have suffered awhile, stablish, strengthen, settle you." Let nothing unsettle us.

So many things do unsettle us unless we have the view of life which Alice Freeman had, to whom, when she was president of Wellesley College, one of her girls came, complaining that she had been insulted and had to answer back in kind. "What would you do if you were insulted as I was?" she demanded indignantly. And Alice Freeman answered, "My dear, there isn't a person in the universe that could insult me." Hers was a peace which floweth like a river and a hope which no earth-born cloud could even for a moment eclipse. The Father's presence was Christ's refuge, his cure for all earth's ills: "I know thou always hearest me." If we can say that, hope can never fail. The Father's care is our canopy. "Underneath are everlasting arms."

Prayer for Mercy

FRIDAY, August 9. Luke 18:13. "God be merciful to me a sinner." This prayer of the publican is valued by all Christian men, not only because our Lord has commended it and many saints have repeated it, but because it expresses the attitude which the believer at all times maintains toward God: his heart is in a continuous penitential relation to God. Conscious of his innate sinfulness and his daily sinning, the Christian faces God at all times as a humble suitor for mercy. The posture of the publican is his typical way of bearing himself in the presence of his God. He recognizes no merit in himself, he pleads no worthiness which would give him a just claim upon God's favor. His single hope and reliance is in the merit of his Saviour Jesus Christ.

The penitence of a Christian is not only sorrow over his sin, but it embraces as its chief constituent element faith in the forgiveness of sin for Christ's sake. The life of Christ is that sinless life which he should have led, and the innocent death of the Sufferer on Calvary is the death that he deserved. God has accepted both as rendered for sinners, and declared himself satisfied by the resurrection of his Son with what his Son did and suffered as the sinners' proxy. This is the evangelical basis for any plea that he makes to God in penitence and faith, that God would not regard him as what he is, a sinner, but as what Jesus has made him, a child of God that had been lost but has been found again, that had been dead but now lives. The truth of the redemption and the atonement is the daily bread of justifying faith. For what the Saviour said of the prayer of the publican, viz., that he went down to his house justified, he still says of every person who repeats this prayer.

The Meditative Mood

SATURDAY, August 10. Ps. 104:34. "My meditation of Him shall be sweet." William Henry Green, the historian, was accustomed to spend the first hour of every day over a page in the Psalms. Here he found strength to perform the great duties of his career.

William E. Gladstone said, "On occasions of sharp pressure or trial, some word of Scripture came to me from my meditations, as if borne on angels' wings. One was, 'O Lord God, thou strength of my heart, thou hast covered my head in the day of battle.' Another was, 'Give thy strength unto thy servant, and help the son of thine handmaid.'"

Should we not obey the words of the Master when he said to his weary disciples, "Come ye apart to a desert place and rest awhile." In quiet lonely places, one meets God face to face. There meditative moods have given to men precious treasures of thought and spiritual culture like à Kempis's Imitation of Christ and Bernard's beautiful songs and writings.

It is natural for a mariner to watch and study his chart and compass, and it is well for the multitude of mankind, voyaging over the sea of time, to do likewise.

The ocean is never too full, though it receives streams from the mountains and rain from the clouds. The soul in meditation ever needs streams of thought from the purple mountains of the past and the coming down of Jesus, like the rain from the heavenly clouds on the heart.

Action must follow contemplation because knowing without doing hardens the conscience and hurts the soul. Continued feeling would overwhelm the mind and paralyze the powers if not expressed in obedient exercise.

Leaders Fall; God Reigns

GOD said to Moses: "Thou shalt not go over into the promised land of Canaan." So the leader of Israel through forty years of wilderness life, ascended from Mount Nebo, and Joshua led the people to final victory. Divine leadership never changes. Transferring his legions from earthly to heavenly armies does not endanger the results of the conflict. God's truth ever marches on.

Those transferred to the front line of the River of Life are still battling with us in invisible aeroplanes.

Abraham Lincoln, like Moses, had a view of the Promised Land of Re-United States of freedom and peace, but he ascended for wider visions and vaster usefulness. His shadow proved to be greater than his life. The entire American people were his pallbearers, and all the world his mourners. His blood recemented the North and the South into one indissoluble union; his death was a victory vaster than Appomattox. Do not the living fight better, remembering the heroes who have fallen?

Those fighting for liberty today are marching under the inspiration of the spirit of the great Emancipator. When Lincoln fell, he arose everywhere. All parties, races, countries, and peoples were brought nearer to each other in a great brotherhood of freedom by his sacrifice.

Millions of soldiers have gone the way of Moses and Lincoln from European battle-grounds. One moment here; the next, beyond the stars. Today, singing national songs as they approach the enemy; tomorrow with the choir invisible. They have found the paradise of peace and freedom while we are fighting on. Is it not one army of the living God, Here or Yonder, one Temple of Liberty, whose pillars rest on eternal foundations, one God over all? His government has no end; His eternal Republic is unshakable!

How noble to die with the full armor on, in the strength of youth and manhood, rather than by slow decline of age and feebleness, quickly promoted to the never-dying hosts of the skies. A French soldier expressed the true view when he said, "I count myself as dead already; if I survive today's battle, tomorrow will give me another chance to die for God and France." A lamb being torn by a wolf has aroused anew the spirit of liberty throughout the world.

Baron Burian's Hard Problem

AUSTRIA'S Foreign Minister, Baron Burian, in an address to the Austrian and Hungarian Premiers—according to Vienna dispatches—reveals the new attitude which Teutonic diplomacy is adopting in the hope of improving peace prospects. "This method of fighting," he declares, "is indignantly disavowed by the races of the dual empire." The Central Powers, while willing for peace, he adds, will continue "their invincible defense," and victorious battles, it is hinted, will be followed with new peace offers, the victors always being "intent on recalling that we regard the war as senseless and purposeless bloodshed, which might at any moment be ended by the reemergence of feelings of humanity in our enemies," who, where they are not aiming at territorial acquisition, "are fighting against a wind-mill." Coming on the heels of the Piave defeat and the Balkan reverses, such statements can have but one interpretation. If diplomacy be the handmaid of war, as the Baron affirms, she has certainly served Austria some shabby tricks lately that should warrant her dismissal.

Austria is sick of the war, and would gladly end it if she could; but she dare not let go. Baron Burian has a big problem on his hands. It is the old problem of national unity, which threatens to reach the breaking-point. He fears that an American influence may hasten this. The open and serious defection of the Czechs and Jugo-Slavs is a nightmare that troubles the Baron, which may at any time turn into reality and dislocate the heterogeneous empire. There is a revelation of weakness in the eagerness with which Burian talked of the "exclusively defensive" alliance with Germany, which he pronounced firm and mutually satisfactory. As a plain matter of fact, the whole world perceives the evidence that it is satisfactory to neither. Austria sees her dominion rent with dissension over the enforced service to Prussian tyranny, and in Germany the note of dissent is growing among the Saxons and Bavarians, who are straining at the bonds which link them to the mad ambition of the "Potsdam gang." Taken as a whole, the speech of the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister must be regarded as misrepresentative of actual conditions and popular sentiment in that country. Instead of being viewed as an aid to peace, it may be classed as another choice specimen of diplomatic sophistry, designed to placate the rapidly growing sentiment in favor of autonomy and self-government among the small peoples, who have been degraded and enslaved by the war.

Locusts and Aeroplanes

THERE is nothing like getting out of a rut, and if one can do so without losing his balance, it is well. A reader of the Christian Herald, Mr. A. H. E., Ramona, Kans., writes this letter:

"I would like if someone would give his view on the 9th chapter of Revelations. I have in mind that our war planes are the locusts the Revelator has in view in that chapter. Surely he did not mean the locusts of Pharaoh's time. These locusts ate every green thing; but not so with the locusts that John the Revelator saw. They were not to hurt the grass of the earth, neither any green thing, neither any tree, but only those men who had not the seal of God on their foreheads. Moreover, these locusts of Revelations had a man's face. I have seen one airship about forty rods away from me, in flight, and the sound was that of a locust, and at the propeller was a man's face, and it also had wings, and the sting in the tail of the locust of Revelations had its parallel in the gun of the aeroplane. Also, in the Greek tongue the name of the angel of the bottomless pit—the instigator of these locusts—is Apollyon, that is to say 'destroyer,' and in this we may recognize another type of what we have in the present war. To carry the ancient parallel still further, we have in President Wilson a typical Joseph, who cares for the poor and suffering and who is seeking the rights of all; who sends corn and flour to the stricken and unfortunate countries, and who is beginning to be looked up to as a father to all nations."

Our correspondent's letter is certainly ingenious and by no means irreverent. While we cannot endorse it on exegetical grounds, it is certainly more to the point than a great deal that is both said and written on this subject, and much more profitable.

Last Stand for Alcohol

THE decisive fight against Alcohol is now on in Congress. Only a very few Senators and Representatives are wavering, still under the malign influence of the forces of evil.

Your telegram, your letter to your Congressman and Senators will help gain war prohibition, speed victory and hasten the homecoming of our boys from overseas.

Let every loyal one of us stand by the President in his effort to send to the front an army big enough to win the war. Let us help free the three hundred thousand able-bodied men now employed in the drink trade for service at the front or on the farm.

Let us all stand by the Food Administration and bring to pass the recently expressed desire of Herbert Hoover that the waste of four and a half million bushels of grain per month in whiskey and beer may be stopped.

Let us relieve the coal shortage by shutting down the breweries which used in 1917 millions of tons of coal, while the people suffered from lack of it.

Now is the time for every man and woman with an opinion on the matter to express that opinion to members of Congress. Every word now counts.

Unheralded Heroes

A WAR so vast as the one now going on abounds in instances of heroism which should be recorded for the benefit of posterity. All preceding wars have had their heroes. Europe, it is true, had three years the start of us, but we are making up gallantly for time lost.

What could be more inspiring, for instance, than the story of the fight at Chateau Thierry, on the opening of the latest great German offensive? In the first shock of the assault, when dense masses of the Huns swarmed down upon the Americans, some of the latter were caught in the human stream and involuntarily became prisoners. Then, when the inevitable American counter-attack took place, it swept along until the point was reached where the captured Americans were guarded, when suddenly they turned on their guards, and bore back with them to the American front, eight Germans as captives.

Then, too, there is the narrative—reminding one of the feats of the Paladins and Crusaders—which tells how an American platoon was left in front of an embankment, behind which was the enemy in force. The platoon fired until its ammunition was well-nigh exhausted, observing which, the Germans shouted to them to surrender. The Yankee answer was one last long, blinding, volley, followed by a shout, and the "dough-boys" were all over the embankment and upon them. So quickly was the whole maneuver performed that, almost before they knew it, they were well on their way back to the American lines, with 38 astonished German prisoners.

Out of the ruck and smoke of the great world conflict are springing up daily instances of magnificent heroism, which show that the old American spirit which has carried the Stars and Stripes to victory in every past campaign, is rejuvenated and incarnated in our gallant boys at the front. The war is making big history; it is also making a race of men whose splendid courage and intrepidity, combined with coolness and firmness in the face of danger, make them equal to any emergency. Uncle Sam may well be proud of his sons, who are fighting for liberty and justice and righteousness.

Thrift for War-Time

THE War Savings Stamp means ready money for the government. It means sound investment and good returns to the buyer. It means cultivation of the excellent habit of saving.

But the money in the Thrift Stamps, however much it may be, is not enough for Uncle Sam; and the citizen who gives all his money in Saving Stamps is still far short of his full duty in thrift.

The government needs money, of course—needs it to the extent of twenty-four billions this year. This is a lot of money. It is infinitely more than was ever raised in the same length of time by any other nation in the world's history. It is about a third of all the wages being paid in our whole country in the same period. But the money that the government needs will come. There will be work in getting it, but it will be got. The real problem is not there.

No; the real problem lies in the government's being able to spend this money—being able to find the things it needs for the forces at the front.

The government will have millions to spend for soldiers' shoes, for instance; but if the leather for the shoes is not to be found—what then? If the leather supply of the country is tied up in civilian shoes in store stocks, and in one, two, three or more extra pairs stuck away in closets, then how is the leather for soldiers' shoes to be had? If the war continues long enough, every extra pair of shoes at home may mean an American soldier barefoot in France.

This sounds extreme, but it is only in line with common history. Shoes are but typical. There are a thousand essential things lacking in the markets, even now, which the government would like to furnish to the boys at the front, but can't. The government has the money to buy all essentials, but it also has a hundred million competitive buyers right here at home.

Here is a wrong state of affairs, to be remedied only by real thrift. The denial of things not actually needed is the best part of thrift at all times, and at present it is the best part of patriotism also. Putting money into War Savings Stamps means government revenue—and that is good. But it also means that this money is not used to buy for home consumption commodities that the government needs to send to the soldiers.

We at home are the second line of defense. The strength of the front line of fighters is dependent upon our sacrifice.

The Savings Stamp is a sturdy little soldier, marching on two strong legs.

The Patriotic Spirit

ALL ministers are not wise; if they were, then we might witness more profitable discussions than frequently occur as the result of indiscreet sermonizing. Almost every day we read in the newspapers of some pastor who lets his lips run away with his brains, as the old saying goes, and who is either unfortunately misconstrued, or else has been guilty of something untactful, if not unpatriotic. This is a time when patriotism has the floor; and if any man in the pulpit or on the platform is out of key with the pervading sentiment of the nation, he does well to be silent, if he cannot keep his remarks in the proper vein. No American audience will listen to unpatriotic addresses now, when there are scores, aye, hundreds of eloquent and earnest pastors to whom they can listen with pleasure, and from whose patriotic fervor they themselves can gather inspiration.

Water in "Death Valley"

IN that arid area of our western territory, known as "Death Valley," in Inyo County, California, the lack of water is so terrible in its effects upon the traveler that many have perished of thirst. The journey across is one of many miles, and so sterile and forbidding is the place and so thoroughly walled in by mountains, shutting out the cooling winds, that it has seemed hopeless to ever make an real use of the place, to cross which has proved fatal to many travelers. Here and there the level floor of the valley is marked by the skeletons of animals which have died of thirst, and the fragments of domestic utensils, broken wagon wheels, etc., tell the fate of travelers of whom no other trace may ever be found. All these years since "Death Valley" was first discovered, it has seemed that it was a hopeless territory and must be abandoned; but science, looking to the brighter side, has undertaken if not to transform, at least to soften and minimize the dangers of "Death Valley." There are springs of clear, cool water, which have doubtless saved many a life, but these are difficult to find. Now the government has undertaken to map out "Death Valley" and to put up sign posts at the springs, indicating their whereabouts. Some have already been indicated. There are also guide posts which, though they may be miles distant from the nearest spring, will, if heeded, infallibly point the traveler to its exact location where he may find refreshment and new life. Hereafter, those who enter "Death Valley," if they look for these signs and follow them, need not perish of thirst nor even suffer long, for they can readily find the springs. Water is essential to life in the vegetable and animal world. The flower gardens, harvest fields, and forests are nearly all water—seventy per cent. of them or more—and they would all die without it. The bodies of all animals, including man, are more than seventy per cent. water. This necessity has caused the inspired writers through the Scriptures to use water as a symbol of salvation so necessary to spiritual life. This earth, with all of its beauty, by man's sin has been made a spiritual desert, a veritable "Death Valley," but Christ is the water of life to the individual soul, and to the institution of mankind. The prophet thus sees and describes him: "In the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert." (Isa. 35 : 6.)

Gave Life for Brothers

MARY BLOCK, a twelve-year-old Hoboken girl, gave up her life the other day in an attempt to save two little brothers from being crushed under a locomotive's wheels. She threw the boys, Philip, five years old, and Charles, four, to one side as their feet touched the tracks. The engine hit her and hurled her several yards to her death. The three children had been visiting relatives on Jersey City Heights, and on their return home, in crossing the West Shore tracks the engine came down upon them. Mary snatched the boys from death, but was unable to escape herself. A life like that of little Mary would have been a precious treasure to her family, to the church and the world; but if she had lived to be 100 years old, she could not have crowded more worth and honor into it than she did in that one moment of supreme heroism when she forgot her own life in her intense love for her two little brothers, and gave up her life for them. For she emulated the undying love of that Saviour who gave his life for the world. Her heroism calls to mind these words: "He saved others; himself he cannot save." (Matt. 27 : 42.)

Club-Footed Errand Boy

TWO gentlemen were riding in an automobile on the streets of a city the other day, and just in front of them was a little boy about twelve that the last thing the lad would be fitted for would be the task of an errand boy; but he mastered the wheel with his club feet and became for the business establishment a swift and successful messenger. Much of business and religious success is achieved by this triumph over hindrances. Zaccheus was so short of stature that he could not see the Saviour passing by, and so he overcame that handicap by climbing a tree, where he got an excellent view, and where Christ could get his eye on him and save him. "And he ran before, and climbed up into a sycamore tree to

Potatoes Growing in Streets

IN the residence section of the beautiful city of Portland, Oregon, there is a crop of real Irish potatoes growing in the streets, a sign of industry and homely thrift. Back yards, front yards, side lots, the "commons" of cities as well as idle farm land have been pressed into the service of sustaining the boys who are fighting for the flag, and those at home who are to back them up. One of the express demands of the Food Department of the Government is to use more corn and potatoes and less wheat. And the good people of Portland have done the wise and loyal thing to turn their lovely thoroughfares into a real sure enough potato patch. From an artistic point of view there is nothing much prettier than healthy potato vines in full bloom. Potatoes are grown in large quantities from the Gulf of Mexico to Alaska. In the Southern States two crops are grown annually. The yield through the country is from 100 to 250 bushels to the acre. The potato is indigenous to America, and has been taken from here to most of the countries of Europe. Columbus did not find gold, as he expected, but he did find the potato a veritable gold mine to the world's wealth. It will do very well to eat potatoes as a substitute for cereal as a war necessity, but it would not do to continue it, as the physical fiber and the mental virility of our people would be perceptibly reduced by it. Humboldt calculated that the same extent of ground which would produce thirty pounds of wheat would produce 1,000 pounds of potatoes. But potatoes do not contain anything like the nutriment there is in wheat. That is why the government asks us to eat potatoes for a while, and let the soldier boys have the wheat. If potatoes were known in olden times we have no record of them. Wheat was their staff of life. In times of shortage the Jews went to Egypt for wheat. Corn is a generic term which includes maize, wheat, barley, rye and oats. Jacob said: "I have heard that there is corn in Egypt: get you down thither, and buy for us from thence; that we may live, and not die." (Gen. 42 : 2.)

see him, for he was to pass that way." (Luke 19 : 4.)

Virgin Islands Vote "Dry"

THE Virgin Islands, America's new possession in the West Indies, went dry. Early in July, both branches of the Provincial Legislature adopted war time prohibition under the provision of an act of Congress at Washington, said law to take effect July 1, 1919. Thus the Virgin Islands follow the wholesome example of Alaska, Porto Rico and the Hawaiian Islands in banishing booze from their borders. The American democracy has taught the world that the people can rule themselves politically. It is now demonstrating the ability of the people to govern themselves morally, and we are banishing the greatest single enemy to the development and happiness of the individual, the intoxicating cup, and are therefore promoting physical, mental, and spiritual efficiency for the nation. The opinion of the American people on the subject of strong drink is that: "It biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." (Prov. 23 : 32.)

Polar Bear's Shrewdness

A WHALER, who has recently returned from a trip to the far north, tells of the singular cleverness of the polar bear, especially in procuring food. He undertook to capture a bear by arranging a slip noose about a bait.

The noose caught one of the bear's paws, but he worked it loose and took the bait away. The bait was set again, but bruin did not like the looks of the rope and brushed it away with his paw. The hunter then covered the rope with snow, but the bear dug down until he saw the rope and said, in his own bear-talk, "not any of that for me," and pulled at the safe end of the rope and got the meat. At last the man put the rope with the bait down in a deep hole, and covered it with snow, but Mr. Bear left the rope for the man, and took the bait for himself. Then the man concluded that the bear was smarter than he was, that his brains had saved his hide and let him go. The bear concluded that he would have a good fat seal for breakfast. He saw one on the ice, near a hole, ready to plunge into it at the approach of danger. Bruin knew that there was not a ghost of a chance of getting the seal if he approached it on the ice, and some distance away he entered the water, through another hole, and swam under the ice, coming out of the hole where the seal was. The weather in Palestine is not cold enough for polar bears, but they have a species of brown bear there that in former times was troublesome and dangerous. There is the account of one of them which did not have as good luck as the polar bear who played with the rope and escaped the whaler. It was the one that, craving a dainty meal, came down to the shepherd's flock and took a spring lamb, and the farmer's son followed, attacked and slew him. "And there came a lion and a bear, and took a lamb out of the flock. And I went out after him, and smote him, and delivered it out of his mouth." (1 Sam. 17 : 34, 35.)

Lawyer Gives to Yale

THE will of John W. Sterling, a lawyer of New York, who died suddenly on July 5, provided for the disposition of an estate estimated at $20,000,000, of which fifteen million goes to Yale University. This is said to have been one of the largest single gifts ever made to an American Educational Institution. The University is virtually left with a free hand to do whatever it may desire with the munificent fortune. He only asks that a substantial building shall be erected somewhere on the grounds that will fittingly perpetuate the gratitude he had in his heart at the great service Yale had rendered him, in preparation for life and for a happy and useful career. Mr. Sterling was one of the hardest workers in America and even up to the time of his death, at 74, he worked from 8:30 A. M. to 5:30 P. M. daily in his office. The gift is an eloquent sermon on this text: "Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom; and with all thy getting get understanding." (Prov. 4 : 7.)

Submarine Sinks San Diego

ABOUT 11:30 A. M., on July 19, the American Cruiser San Diego, formerly the California, returning home after conveying troops abroad, was sunk ten miles off Fire Island Light on the Long Island Coast. Of the total complement of 1224 officers and men it seemed probable on July 24 that 11 had been lost. Three were known to be killed, 8 were missing and 12 were supposed to be absent on leave. Although no torpedo or periscope was seen the Captain was positive that his ship had been torpedoed. Naval experts were said to incline to the belief that she had struck a mine, as mines were swept up later near the scene of the sinking. The San Diego displaced 13,680 tons, was 502 feet long and had a speed of 22 knots. The first news of the disaster was brought to Fire Island by a naval aviator. Fast launches and other craft at once put off and wireless directions were sent to ships at sea. Four steamers were soon standing by to pick up survivors, and the fact that no attack was made on these vessels was one reason for the belief that a mine had done the work. The vessel was struck "abaft the beam" on the port side, putting the port engine out of business. The ship at once listed to port, but Captain Cristy, believing she would remain afloat, ordered the crew to battle quarters for defense against the submarine which he believed responsible for the explosion. The gun crews stayed at their posts until the heeling over of the boat made the guns useless. As the hull rolled over, one gunner ran the length of the bilge keel and called for three cheers for the old ship and the U. S. A. Then, as the cheers were given and the ship went down he dived overboard. Some loss of life was caused by the explosion in the engine room and some by the collapse of one of the funnels.

An attack by a German submarine on a tug and its tow off Cape Cod, on July 21, indicated that the San Diego had been torpedoed. The tug, the Perth Amboy, was attacked off Orleans, Mass. Three torpedoes missed and shell fire followed. The tug was set on fire and her three barges, only one of which was loaded, were also shelled. The gun fire cost one member of the tug's crew his right hand and another an arm. The forty-three people on the barges were all saved, although their small boats were hardly adequate to carry them, and they made for shore through bursting shrapnel. The submarine was attacked and driven off by seaplanes which dropped bombs forcing the enemy to submerge and make off, but they apparently did not score a fatal hit. The attack was near enough to shore to be watched by thousands of summer residents who held their observation points in spite of occasional chance shells which burst over the shore.

A Week in the World's News

IN TROUBLED RUSSIA. The Bolshevik Foreign Minister protested vigorously, both by cable to Washington and London and to the diplomats at Vologda, against the landing of the British and American forces on the Murman coast, which, on July 17, was completely occupied by Allied troops. Regardless of the protests, preparations were continuing to give adequate support to the people of northern Russia against either Finnish, German or Bolshevik enemies. Dispatches of July 15, via Peking, reported further victories of Czech-Slovak troops in clearing of Bolshevik forces the line of the Trans-Siberian Railroad between Irkutsk and Harbin.

Following an interview between President Wilson and Viscount Ishii at Washington, a special meeting of the Japanese Cabinet was called on July 13. It was believed that the meeting and conference forecast Japanese action in Siberia, and it was reported that Japan had been preparing for several months to send a military expedition. On July 19 it was announced that Japan had concurred in plans suggested by the United States for joint American-Japanese intervention in Siberia. Great Britain and France are also to send contingents of troops. One object of the intervention is to give adequate support to the Czech-Slovaks who are said to be willing to stay in Russia and Siberia, and to fight there so long as they have sufficient support and can fight Germans. These Czech-Slovaks, on July 15, captured the city of Kazan, 430 miles east of Moscow on the lower Volga. Twenty million people are reported as facing starvation in Russia unless the Allied nations come to their relief.

CZAR NICHOLAS EXECUTED. The recurrent rumors of the death of the former Czar were definitely confirmed by the Russian wireless on July 20th. He was executed by the authority of the the Soviet Council of the Urals on the 16th, because the Czech-Slovaks were threatening to take Yekaterinburg and the Bolsheviks feared the loss of their prisoner. There was also a charge that a plot had been discovered, centering about the former ruler, for a counter-revolution against the Bolsheviks. The former Empress and heir to the throne were reported well and in a safe place. Thus dies ignominiously a ruler who knew the right way, but was too weak to follow it. Nicholas suggested the Peace congress at the Hague, favored disarmament, recognized the growth of democracy by establishing the Duma, but, perhaps because of the insincerity of his cousin, William of Berlin, he made little progress toward the first two, and because of the overmastering forces of reaction in Petrograd, he was led to cripple the Duma until it was but an empty shell of its earlier promise. Then when his country was at war, he was unable to protect his armies from the corruption of self-seekers and the dastardly work of enemy sympathizers. He failed, but the story of his fall and its results is too fresh in memory to need recapitulation.

WAR SAVINGS SUCCEED. The National War Savings Committee announced, on July 20, that there had been sold for cash $417,000,000 worth of War Savings Stamps while pledges made in the recent campaign indicated total sales of $1,600,000,000, leaving only $400,000,000 unprovided for of the $2,000,000,000 worth which it was expected to sell by January 1st, 1919. With War Savings Societies throughout the country pushing the little aids to victory, it was felt that the goal would certainly be reached.

CHOLERA IN SWEDEN. Asiatic Cholera, which is said to be numbering 250 victims in 24 hours at Petrograd, and to be raging in Moscow and other Russian cities, was reported to have broken out in Stockholm on July 17th.

LOOKING TOWARD PEACE. In a cablegram to the New York Times from London, on July 13, Arnold Bennett protested against the terms "peace trap" and "peace offensive" commonly applied by the British press toward peace proposals from Teutonic sources. peculiarly wicked. He declared that such an attitude of mind would eventually react unfavorably upon our own soldiers, and that instead of rebuffing Austria, we should encourage her to break with her Prussian masters. He admitted that all suggestions for peace so far coming from Germany had been utterly impossible. Summing up, he said: "Peace is urgently desired by the whole world, and the attainment of peace must be regarded not as a crime or insanity, but as a virtue and the highest wisdom. Only the peace must be a peace which will satisfy the principles laid down by President Wilson. No such peace has yet been offered; nor are the rulers of Germany ready to offer such a peace; but events are moving quickly, and either in Germany or Austria, but particularly in Austria, a march of events quite unconnected with the actual fighting might suddenly, and perhaps unknown to us, render such a peace possible. Nothing can be gained by the chattering about 'peace traps,' nothing has yet been lost thereby, but something might be lost quite soon, for after the next German push has been stopped, a change will come over the scene.

HOW WE FEED OURSELVES AND OUR ALLIES. The Food Administration by permission of the White House made public on July 18, the following letter, written by Mr. Hoover to the President:

Dear Mr. President:

It is now possible to summarize the shipments of food-stuffs from the United States to the Allied countries during the fiscal year just closed—practically the last harvest year. These amounts include all shipments to Allied countries for their and our armies, the civilian population, the Belgian Relief and Red Cross.

The total value of these food shipments which were in the main purchased through, or with the collaboration of the Food Administration, amount to, roundly, $1,400,000,000 during the year.

The shipments of meats and fats (includes meat products, dairy products, vegetable oils, etc.) to Allied destinations were as follows:

Fiscal year 1916-17
2,166,500,000 lbs.

Fiscal year 1917-18
3,011,100,000 lbs.

Increase, 844,600,000 lbs.

The increase in shipments is due to conservation and the extra weight of animals added by our farmers.

In cereals and cereal products reduced to terms of cereal bushels, our shipments to Allied destinations have been—

259,900,000 bus.

Fiscal year 1917-18
340,800,000 bus.

Increase, 80,900,000 bus.

Of these cereals our shipments of the prime breadstuffs in the fiscal year 1917-18 to Allied destinations were, wheat 131,000,000 bushels and of rye 13,900,000 bushels a total of 144,900,000 bushels. In addition, some 10,000,000 bushels of 1917 wheat are now in port for Allied destinations or en route thereto. The total shipments to Allied countries from our last harvest of wheat will be, therefore, about 141,000,000 bushels, or, a total of 154,900,000 bushels of prime bread-stuffs. In addition to this we have shipped some 10,000,000 bushels to neutrals dependent upon us.

It is interesting to note that since the urgent request of the Allied Food Controllers early in the year for a further shipment of 75,000,000 bushels from our 1917 wheat than originally planned, we shall have shipped to Europe or have en route, nearly $5,000,000 bushels. At the time of this request our surplus was already more than exhausted. These figures, however, do not fully convey the volume of the effort and sacrifice made during the past year by the whole American people. Despite the magnificent effort of our agricultural population in planting a much increased acreage in 1917, not only was there a very large failure in wheat but also the corn failed to mature properly and our corn is our dominant crop. The consumption and waste in food have been greatly reduced in every direction during the year.

I am sure that all the millions of our people, agricultural as well as urban, who have contributed to these results should feel a very definite satisfaction that in a year of universal food shortages in the northern hemisphere all of those people joined together against Germany have come through into sight of the coming harvest not only with health and strength fully unimpaired, but with only temporary periods of hardship. Our contributions to this end could not have been accomplished without effort and sacrifice and it is a matter for further satisfaction that it has been accomplished voluntarily and individually. It is difficult to distinguish between various sections of our people—the homes, public eating places, food trades, urban or agricultural populations—in assessing credit for these results, but no one will deny the dominant part of the American women.

Yours faithfully,
(Signed) HERBERT HOOVER.

WE WILL KEEP WARM. The Fuel Administration announced on July 21, one of the summer's hottest days in the east, that the production of bituminous coal had passed the 13,000,000 ton mark on July 13, and that if the pace was kept up there would be no fuel famine next winter.

NO SALVATION FOR THE KAISER. Germany has placed a ban on the Salvation Army. The organization has been destroyed in Germany and Austria. All the orphanages, rescue homes, lodging houses, hospitals and meeting places were confiscated and the members were scattered.

FARMERS WILL CONFER FOR VICTORY. The Federal Board of Farm Organizations has issued a call for a national meeting of farmers to be held at Washington, Aug. 27, 28, 29, to consider such action as will best promote the production of farm crops in 1919; sufficient to supply our own people, our Allies and the neutrals who depend upon us, and, to replenish our national reserves. America's acres can and must win the war. American farmers will be asked to plant this fall not less than 45,000,000 acres of winter wheat.

The Church That Made Good

By
B. F. F.

THIS story has a personal message, not only to ministers, but to church members and God's people everywhere. It is especially applicable in these times, when the whole problem of the Church, its duty and its opportunities, is being widely discussed. We invite everyone who reads B. F. F.'s story and who has personal knowledge of conditions in any city, town or village that might be helped by such an experiment, to write us briefly on the subject. By doing this you may be the means of giving a good start to a worthy and sorely needed work in some locality that needs only the application of a strong lever to set things moving.

Part I

"YOU surely have a wonderful institution here, and a remarkable work has been accomplished; a work, which unless seen, would hardly be believed, if one were told about it."

The speaker was the Rev. Dr. Wilson, who was seated in the study of his friend and former classmate and fellow graduate the Rev. John Williams. They had just completed a round of the church buildings and the various parish houses connected with it.

Dr. Wilson and Mr. Williams had been former classmates and fellow graduates from an eastern theological seminary. The former soon after graduating had been called to become the assistant to the pastor of one of the large churches in the East. And when the latter died, had been chosen his successor. Mr. Williams had gone West, and accepted a call to the church where he was still pastor, when his former classmate came into that section of the country on a lecturing trip.

They had not met, until now, since the day that they had bid each other goodbye at the station in the town where the seminary was located.

"Yes," replied Mr. Williams in reply to the statement of the former, "the work is wonderful, and when I look back, I can hardly realize that so much has been accomplished."

"Tell me the story of your work here," said Dr. Wilson, "I confess that I am intensely interested, and having heard something about it, I am anxious to have you tell me just how you accomplished, what most men would consider the impossible."

"WELL," replied his friend, "to begin at the beginning—for all things have a beginning—you know that after we graduated I came to the West, because its vastness, its almost limitless boundaries, its large way of doing things always appealed to me, and because I felt that there I should find more opportunities for expansion than anywhere else. After coming here, I had the opportunity of preaching to this church, which at that time was without a pastor. Before I left, they extended a call to me which I accepted. There were two other churches in the town. The church to which I was called, was if anything the strongest of the three; yet with all this it did not pay more than an ordinary salary, while the other churches, if I am right, paid if anything a little less. Each had its own church house, all three had small but comfortable parsonages. Not being married at that time, my parsonage was rented to an elderly couple with whom I made my home."

"The churches, as far as they were able under the circumstances, did effective work. But as the field was limited there was constant competition, which resulted in more or less friction, and what one might call unchristian rivalry between the churches. For example, if a new family moved into the town, there was an immediate scramble among the churches to get this particular family into their church. As I look back over the past, I see that the question of real religious life was lost sight of in the effort to get this or that family, especially if they possessed financial means, into the churches. My own church was at that time quite as much at fault as the others. You can readily see that this spirit did not produce the best effect on the men and women who, for one reason or another, were outside of the churches. The churches seemingly at odds, and not harmonizing as they should, did not have the influence for good they should have had."

"THE more I considered local conditions, and tried to find why the churches did not realize better results, the more I became convinced that there were too many churches in the town, that it was dividing forces, wasting energy, using money and power to build up three separate and distinct churches or organizations, each of which claimed to be doing the same work; that it was a duplication of effort, a clinging to a distinction without a difference."

"Here I reasoned, were three churches, with three preachers, each of whom had spent many years in preparation, and each trying to do his duty as he saw it, each working—I confessed this to myself—often not so much to save men and women, as trying to get their names on their church records. Here were three organizations with three church houses and various societies and Sunday Schools working for what? This seemed clear to me, that all of us had lost sight of the primary function of the church, the saving of men and women, and devoted time and energies to fighting for an existence, and getting the means to pay pastors and current expenses. It became a growing conviction with me, that this was not right—it was not in accord with the prayer of the Master, when he prayed "That they all might be one, as He and the Father were One." The more I thought about called sects or denominations. The deeper I went into this problem, the more it became evident that it was not so much a question of doctrine that divided the churches; that the great fundamental principles of religion were held in common by all of them, though the language in which they were expressed might differ. I found that the Apostle's Creed—which is perhaps the oldest formula of faith—was accepted by all of the churches and recited at almost every public service. I found also that, when it came to matters of polity, while there were differences and divergencies, these had often mainly to do with details, and that after all they did not present any insurmountable difficulties.

"Out of these studies there finally grew material, which was developed into a series of sermons or addresses. I developed the proposition, that inasmuch as the churches stood for the same great fundamental ideas and the same religious principles, and as their differences were principally those relating to policy, it would be wisdom for them to unite forces for the accomplishing of greater good. I took the ground that as there must be some common ground on which all Christians, irrespective of their differences in polity, could unite, it was the duty of every member of the church to become willing to accept this common basis and, standing on it, work for a united church. At the outset I conceded that in order to effect an organic union of the churches, each church must be willing, and ready to make concessions; that they must be willing to surrender some of the non-essentials; that it would be impossible to effect this union if one church wanted everything its own way. I made the point that in all of the church creeds and politics there were things and elements which, though differently worded and phrased, at their foundation were similar; that if the churches would get together on the points on which they agreed, the things on which there was a divergence of opinion would take care of themselves."

"Before I delivered these addresses, I prepared a paper on church union, which, when my turn came, I read at the meeting of the County Ministerial Association. In this paper I dealt with the subject from the standpoint of efficiency in church work. I said that the modern tendency in commercial and industrial lines was to unite forces and combine efforts for the purpose of saving energy, and obtaining more in return for the effort and money expended; that the tendency was to concentrate the powers of the man employed and bring them to the point where they would work together for the accomplishment of the object desired. I said that, in this age, the man of the world was wiser than the children of the kingdom. I contended that the church wasted too much of its powers and its money in duplication of effort, in trying to do the same work in many localities by separate organizations, and that one well organized, equipped, and efficiently managed organization could and would accomplish much better. The church was making of no effect the prayer of its Master and Head, that they might be one even as He and the Father were One."

"The paper created considerable discussion, yet before it was ended, the association formally endorsed it, both as having its basis in Scripture and common sense. This paper opened the way for taking the question up with the other two pastors. It seems both of them had been thinking along the same lines, although perhaps not going into the matter as thoroughly as I had done. It was arranged that a series of union services should be held, at which I was to deliver the sermons I had prepared. These sermons were published by one of the local papers, and if I remember, I sent them to you at that time. They created much discussion and comment, and later became the basis on which the organic union of the churches was effected."

"One thing which brought about the union of the churches sooner than might have been expected, was the fact that soon after the series of sermons had been preached, one of the pastors was compelled, on account of sickness in his family, to resign his pulpit and remove to California. This left the pulpit vacant, and the members of the church began attending my church, while some of them took up the question of disbanding their own church organization and becoming members of ours. They came to me to talk the matter over. I realized that it was a somewhat delicate question for me to decide, so I told them that I would rather not give them any advice; but if they voluntarily decided on the step, would be glad to welcome them into my church, if they felt that that was the wisest thing for them to do. They considered the matter for several months, and finally at a church meeting voted to dissolve their organizations and

A White Church on a Hill

By W. LIVINGSTON LARNED

THE road turns in at Hadley's Lane . . . that road of birch and bird,
And you can see the wee, small church that shrouns His holy Word.
The dark, green foliage of the trees bends over and about
With here and there a willow branch to pick the high-lights out.
The grass is gay . . . the grass is soft, up there, by Hadley's Lane,
And every hedge is prim and bright, from wash of mountain rain.

To-day, the Road is drab with dust . . . the birches powdered white;
And faint, dim vista of the hills swims in a Sabbath light.
A horse, beneath a plumed branch, paws. A carriage, further on,
Creaks slowly up the last, hot slope, to Hadley's—and is gone.
And, oh the prim bouquet of girls . . . the little, pink-sashed girls,
With fluffy skirts and shiny shoes and ribbons in their curls!

There comes the organ's solemn purr and "Lord, Abide with Me."
Hymns, mingled with the songs of birds, in sweetest harmony.
Each window wide, the notes pour forth, until, a mile away Down, where the Valley harvests are they hear His Word to-day.
But now—as then—despite the years, with every vagrant breeze
We mark the clean, white pillars rise through curtained willow trees.

That one impression seems to hold far greater than the rest;
God's house, in spotless vestment clad and virgin trimmings dressed.
It was so white against the green! So like the drift of snow
That tops a lofty mountain peak the Alpine climbers know.
For miles around you saw its form, resplendent, stately, trim,
As if a halo crowned the Hill with Purity, for Him.

It's there today . . . we wandered back . . . walked up, past Hadley's Lane, Stood breathless underneath the trees . . . the same old trees again.
It had not changed so very much. Time touched with gentle hand.
The gleaming white had turned to grey . . . the silver birch was tanned,
But we could see those little girls . . . the Valley's path was bright,
And on the hushed, warm Sabbath air the same "Lead, Kindly Light."

it, the more I realized that the church, to do effective work, must unite and unify its forces; that one of the sources of the church's weakness was in this division of forces, and that the old saying "in union there is strength," was more than true.

"In thinking about this condition, I soon realized that there were, what on the surface seemed to be, insurmountable difficulties in the way. Here were men and women who for a life time, yes, for generations, had been accustomed to worship after certain prescribed forms, who had been taught that their form of church government was as near as possible to—if not entirely—identical with the New Testament form of church government. Men and women who because of long associations had become wedded to their denominational name, who believed that that name represented the great fundamental ideas for which their church stood."

"My own church was no exception to this. Its membership was made up largely of fine, deeply spiritual, consecrated men and women who loved their church, made sacrifices for its welfare, and stood by it in and under all conditions."

"The great question was: how to win these men and women of my own church over to the idea and purpose of unifying the forces that made for righteousness. That was my problem. I realized that the seed must first be sown in my own parish—that the work must begin there. I was also convinced that the task was a most delicate one; a task that would require the wisdom of the serpent, the guilelessness of the dove, and the perseverance of the saints to accomplish."

"Before making any attempt to bring about any changes in existing conditions, I began a careful study of the politics of the three churches represented in the town. I devoted a year or more to this study, going into it from every conceivable angle, and getting down to the underlying fundamental principles and differences which divided the churches into soas individuals to unite with the other churches. The official members of the church came to me and told me of their decision, and said they believed that almost the entire membership would unite with the church of which I was pastor. This they did inside of several months.

"After they had decided on this step, the question came up as to what disposal should be made of their church houses. They sought my counsel. I told them that the best thing they could do would be to undertake some minor changes, one being to make a parish house out of the church. The church, I told them, could be used as a center for the social and other gatherings of the congregations. To this they readily agreed.

"The church, under the new conditions, became the center for many of our activities. The pews had been disposed of and chairs bought, which we could place as we wanted them. This gave us a large room for social and other gatherings.

"The Superintendent of the Public schools was a member of my church, and became interested in some of my plans. He suggested that we arrange for some night classes for the young people of the town who, for one reason or another, had been compelled to leave school before they had completed their studies. This was one of the things I had contemplated; so I was more than glad to have him volunteer his assistance. He prepared an outline course of study, which he thought would answer the purpose, and which, as far as I could see was most excellent. Then he interested some of his teachers in the night school and secured enough assistance to launch the project. It was a decided success from the very start. In fact, the applications for membership in the classes were greater than we anticipated; so we had to enlarge our plans, and make room for the large number of young people who had enrolled.

"One of the things I have always firmly believed in is that the church should be the center around which the mental, social and religious life of the people should revolve. The church had in many instances lost sight of the former, and had centered its work on the spiritual side of men's lives exclusively. This I believed had a great deal to do with the alienation of many from the church. Not that the spiritual is less important than the mental and social life of the people. I hold that the very reverse is true; yet the church must not forget the fact that its mission is to the entire man, and not to a part of the man. With this in mind, I made the parish house the center of the social and mental life of the people, while the church stood for the spiritual life. In giving play to the social and intellectual forces, we did not for a moment let this become the ruling idea. Our social gatherings, our lectures, our educational work, were never the aim and end of our efforts; they were simply the means by which we sought to draw men and women into higher and spiritual paths, and we never were satisfied with our work unless we saw them take a decided stand for the Christian life.

"The records of the church during the past years show that in almost every instance we succeeded along these lines. In a few years the church membership was doubled, the Sunday-School took on new life, in fact every department of the church showed new vigor and became more energetic in its work.

"Another change, however, was pending, which helped to make our church still more efficient. The other church, which was the smallest of the three, became interested more than ever in the idea of uniting its forces with ours. This was largely due to the fact that some of their young people had found their way into our night schools, and were thus drawn, without any effort on our part, into the social and intellectual life of our church; and some of them found their way into the regular church services and activities, so the matter of uniting with our church was almost a foregone conclusion. The pastor of the church had several conferences with me on the matter of uniting with us. He had in the meantime taken the matter up with the heads of his denomination. Several conferences with these heads and with the secretaries of the various church societies, were held. They were men of broad minds and views, and after looking the field over and carefully considering the matter from every standpoint, they advised the step. This the church finally took, and in a body united with our church. Then we found that our work, with its enlarged field, had become too big for one man to take care of, so the pastor of this church was chosen as my associate. He proved a most valuable man for this work, and is still at the head of the various departments of the church's activities.

"It would seem that the assimilation and unification of these different churches would be a difficult task, but it was not found to be so. These men and women had known each other for nearly a lifetime; they had worked together and associated with each other every day in the week, so they soon fell into step and worked together in perfect harmony."

To be concluded next week

A SMALL tear-stained letter came to me this morning, a letter from a mother who lives in a busy little middle western city.

"I don't know," read the letter, "how I'm ever going to live through the heart-break of this war! I didn't realize the horror and the sadness of it until my oldest son left, this morning, for training camp. And then it came upon me, suddenly, that I might never see him again. And I've been crying ever since, and thanking God, between my sobs, that my other boys are too young to be called to the colors!"

"I'm afraid that you'll think this a cowardly, unpatriotic sort of a letter. For I don't seem to feel any pride—I wonder if all other mothers feel as I feel?"

So wrote the mother who lived in a busy little middle-western city. And this is by way of being an answer to her letter.

War is a burden—a burden that rests most heavily upon the shoulders of the mothers who have given their sons to their nation. The boy at the front is too busy making history to have much time for worry or apprehension. It is the mother who shrinks away from the sight of a printed casualty list—who lies awake far into the night wondering whether her son has a blister on his heel, or a sore throat, or clean underwear. It is the mother at home who reads the crash of cannon into a summer thunder storm, and the stain of a battle-field into the sky at sunset.

And so, because it is harder for the mothers than it is for any one else, one can scarcely blame the mother who feels only fright when she should be feeling pride. And yet—

"I wonder if all mothers feel as I feel?" questioned the woman from the middle west.

I SAW a motor car draw up to the curb in front of an office building the other day. It was an attractive motor car and I glanced at it casually. And then, all at once, I found myself staring at it with a greater interest. For there was a service flag in the window of the car—a service flag with four blue stars in the center of it.

I looked at the flag in the window of that car. And then I looked beyond it, to the face of the woman who was sitting inside of the car. And I saw that it was a brave face—and a smiling one.

It was later in the day that I heard the story of the woman, and of what the four stars in the service flag stood for. And, after I had heard it, I remembered the smiling face, and the memory of it made me go at my work in a more worth while way—made me braver in the meeting of the little problems that lay in my path; made me smile more cheerfully and determinedly as I said good-by to the men that I knew who were marching away to war.

The Woman Behind the Service Flag

The woman in the motor car is a widow with three sons and one daughter. The daughter is, herself, married and the mother of a very beautiful little baby girl. And the four stars in the service flag stand for the three sons, and the son-in-law, who is the baby girl's father.

The oldest son enlisted first. He joined the infantry and his brother-in-law went with him and is now with a machine gun detachment. The youngest son is in the quartermaster's department. And the second son—

The second son, since birth, has been deaf and dumb. It has taken years to train his unusually active mind—to educate him by the wonderful new methods of teaching those so afflicted. For that reason he has, of course, been a greater care to his mother—a greater responsibility—than the other two, normally healthy sons, and one feels that her love for him must have been more tender even than the love she bore for the rest of her children.

AND so, when the war came and her other boys were taken away from her, one cannot help thinking that perhaps the mother was a tiny bit glad that she was to have one son left at home with her—glad that there were only three stars (for there were only three stars then) on her service flag.

But the boy, the deaf and dumb boy, was not glad! He wanted to fight as his brothers were fighting—he wanted to do his bit, to play his part in the great game of history-making, as his brothers were playing their part. . . .

It was only a short time ago that the boy's wish came true—only a short time ago that a rule went into effect permitting the deaf and dumb to take their place in the line of khaki-dressed men who are defending their country. And the deaf and dumb boy applied and was accepted for the office of bomb thrower.

A bomb-thrower is a man who goes up in an aeroplane with an aviator and, at a given signal, drops bombs upon enemy territory. One does not need hearing or speech to be efficient in this branch of the service, for the signal may be a touch on the shoulder, or a glance, or a gesture.

And so the boy, overjoyed, told his mother that he, too, was going over-seas. And she, with pride in his wonderful spirit and his willingness to serve—placed a fourth star in her service flag and covered her loneliness and heartache with a smile.

THIS is the story of the woman behind the four-starred service flag—the brave woman that I saw the other day sitting calmly in her motor car. I think that her story holds a message to the tearful little mother from the middle west—and to other tearful mothers all over our land. I think that her story holds a gallant assurance that American women will do their part—that they will be brave—that they will give, give, until there is no more to give!

Oh, women all over the United States—you who have hung a service flag in your window and are waiting in the shadow of it—wait bravely, as bravely as the smiling woman that I saw in the motor car is waiting. Let the service flag in your window be the symbol of pride—pride that you want to cry aloud to the world—not of fear! And have faith in the Great Father whose hand is stretched out over the battlefields—the Great Father who gave his only Begotten Son, and has hung a million stars in the great service flag of his heaven every night.

The woman with the four-starred service flag carries this message to you. And it is a very personal message from one member of the great Christian Herald family to the other members. For the woman is Mrs. Louis Klopsch—widow of the man whose genius and self-sacrifice were the means of up-building the Christian Herald.

DANDELIONS

By NANCY RICHY RANSON

YOU gathered dandelions in the sun,
And in my lap you poured their glinting gold;
Across the fields your brown bare feet would run
To find me treasures, beautiful, untold.

The dandelion, meek, with golden heart—
Somehow you loved it more than all the rest;
Your bare feet wandered where it grew, apart,
Your childish fancy chose it for the best.

* * * * *

But that was long ago. One day I knew
That, over night, you were a soldier tall—
When, khaki-clad, you came to say that you Must hurry, to obey your country's call.

Through swimming eyes my stoic spirit gazed
Across the fields where you were wont to play—
And oh, the dandelions fairly glazed,
Triumphant, as you proudly marched away.

* * * * *

Yes, that was long ago. And when it came—
The message that in battle you had died—
In anguish I could only call your name,
While heartache fought with overwhelming pride.

That day a thousand dandelions bright
In sympathetic sorrow seemed to wave—
And in the sleepless stillness of the night
They promised me to blossom on your grave.

Helping Others

International Sunday School Lesson for August 11

Luke 10:25-37 and Gal. 6:1-10

By GEORGE D. ALLISON, Ph.D.

IN Paul's great list of Christian callings as characterized by their gifts, in I Corinthians 12, he speaks of "helps" right in the same verse with "apostles" and "prophets." It is an encouraging word for those of us who feel that we are not great and wise, for we can all fit in as "helps." And fundamentally, helpfulness manifests Christlikeness in a more essential way than speaking with tongues or working miracles. Jesus was, and is, humanity's great Helper. The Greek word "Paraclete," applied to the Holy Spirit in the Gospel of John, really means helper rather than comforter or advocate. Comforting and interceding are only two of the Spirit's ways of helping.

When our Boy Scouts repeat at every meeting the second point of their Scout Oath and promise on their honor to do their best "to help other people at all times," they are imitating the career of Jesus and endeavoring to realize in present-day boy-life his great commandment in this parable of the Good Samaritan, "Go and do thou likewise." The Scout Oath and Law are only examples of the tendency of our times to come closer to Jesus in seeking to live a life of ministry to human need.

Religion on Its Practical Side

In past times, men theorized very much about Christianity. Today they feel sure that Christ would have his followers take their religion very practically. The keen criticism of our day, demanding results and deeds from those who profess faith, is nothing new to the Bible student who has looked carefully for the emphasis in Jesus' teachings. From the first He distinguished between those who name his name and those who do his will. "Not every one that sayeth, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdom of heaven but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven." His last reproach against the Pharisees, as he walked in the Temple courts was this, "They say and do not." James, the Lord's brother, wrote his great epistle to call the early church to steadfastness in the practical manifestation of their faith by their works. His royal law of love was the law of Christian helpfulness, quite a different thing from the old Judaic legalism which prescribed a round of petty requirements irrespective of their serviceableness to others. James gives us the earliest statement of Christianity as Altruism, going into such modern applications as justice to employees and freedom from discrimination against the poor and ignorant.

Hence we see that from the very beginning, Christianity has been a life rather than a creed or a philosophy. "By their fruits shall ye know them." This is not an easier test but the very hardest of all. Can we say that our lives pass muster as helpful in the sense in which Jesus lived to serve others and went about doing good?

Ministry Due to Those Most in Need

Who is my neighbor that I must love as myself, to fulfil the Great Commandment of love to God? Jesus answered: the man who needs your help most, and He told the immortal story of the despised foreigner who was a true neighbor to the robbed, wounded, helpless Jew. That glorious parable compelled the assent of the prejudiced Hebrew lawyer. But did the immediate followers of Jesus in the early days act upon their Master's principle? Indeed they did, going at once with the gospel news and the gospel helpfulness to the slave, the widow, the orphan and the sick. James summed up pure and undefiled religion as holiness and visiting the needy, and he put the visitation first. Paul, the cultured rabbi, ministered to the Gentile, the barbarian, and the riff-raff of the Corinthian docks. He taught the Greeks to gather collections for the famine sufferers in Palestine, which it is safe to say they had never even thought of doing before. Helping others was the keystone in the arch the new religion was building over our blundering humanity.

In our day, the figure of the Good Samaritan dominates the world. In place of his "two shillings," we have relief funds by the millions and instead of his first-aid of oil and wine, the marvelous ministries of the Red Cross with anesthetics, surgical skill and tenderest thoughtful care. All of our people vie with one another in making Uncle Sam a modern Good Samaritan enlarged to an international scale. We are proud today that our country is not only succoring the afflicted but putting the robbers to flight as well. The great altruism of the nation, under the guidance of Christian statesmen, will surely bear fruit in individual lives among our people.

The priest and the Levite may have been afraid to stop to help their fellow-countryman in his need, but our Y. M. C. A. secretaries go to foreign lands and minister under shell-fire to Italian or French as gladly as to our own lads. To turn from the war imagery, remember Father Damien the brave Belgian who dared to play the Good Samaritan to heathen lepers at far-off Molokai.

So in the coming year our churches are resolving to serve the neediest at home, while not slacking on the world-task as well. A new impetus will be given to the task of helping the ignorant immigrant in our midst, and he will be prayed for and ministered unto, let us hope. While there is no new influx of strangers to overwhelm us, we should Americanize and Christianize as never before. The Home Mission study book for the coming year is called "The Gospel for a Working World," and shows us places where help is sorely needed in the matter of child labor, and safeguarding our working girls and securing fair-play for our toiling industrial masses. For some of our people, this book will open up a whole new field for organized Christian helpfulness. The foreign missions book of the women is like unto it, "Women Workers of the Orient."

Christianity differs from other programs of human betterment in giving ministry to the spirit the first place in importance. That is why it outlasts all of the schemes and panaceas of the faddists. Practically, however, we often find ourselves, like the Samaritan, unable to reach the soul till the body is healed and housed. That is why we feel the need of giving so much money and undertaking so many social reforms. We must fight drink and sweatshops and child labor in order that spiritual life in Christ Jesus may be more available for myriads around us. Then our supreme ministry has scope. But first and last, we seek souls—God's children—to give them their rightful heritage.

How wonderfully Jesus ministered to sinners! See his kindness to unfaithful Peter. See his searching, firm challenge to the woman of Samaria in all the unworthiness of her life. See his masterly handling of Zaccheus with his problem of wealth. Paul caught the Master's own spirit and enjoined the Galatians to a like gentleness in guiding those overtaken in a fault. We judge best if we picture sin crouching like a wild beast and taking our brother by surprise on an unprotected side of his nature. Our attitude must be one of pity, mixed strongly with fellow-feeling drawn from a knowledge of our own faults, as we seek to give aid. The Christian must be ever ready to extend a hand to lift; must never, by so much as a careless word, thrust down another into the mire.

To give the supreme help, we must be transformed by contact with the spirit of Christ; we must be truly born from above. Then our "helps" will abound, for the fruits of the spirit are "love, joy, peace, gentleness, meekness, temperance, faith." These things men need more than loaves and fishes, good wages and fine houses, more than they need pleasure, even more than health. The spiritual and the temporal blessings are complementary—each aids the other.

The Widening Circles of Helpfulness

In the Sunday school class, we want to be sure that the children are really applying their teachings in life, first of all in the home and reaching out into all the world, even in childhood, through the many avenues that are open to even the youngest today. None are too young to be taught that Christian helpfulness begins at home, and that a professed follower of Jesus who does not help in his own household has "denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever." Get your pupils to make a list of acts of helpfulness they can perform during the coming week. You may be surprised by the variety and contrast in children's opportunities. A friend of mine received two diverse answers from two youngsters who sat side by side in class. In response to the question what duty have you to help in your home life tomorrow, the first replied, "To be considerate to the servants," and the second, "to chase after wood for my mother." How different the circumstances, but how practical and helpful the answers!

Home helpfulness must still come first, but what a wonderful range even children have today. They sell thrift stamps for their government, they knit garments for refugees on the other side of the earth. If they are wisely led they also give to Christian missions that the future of India and China may be influenced by the Gospel of the Kingdom of God. And home missions and local charities are not to be forgotten. Surely the sacrifices and the generous services of this hour can be utilized by the Church of Christ, to imbue the rising generation with a holier conception of life and a more practical application of the teachings of Jesus than the world has ever seen. Give your boys and girls a vision of the opportunities of service at home, in your town, in our country and throughout the uttermost parts of the earth.

The International Sunday School Convention

By FRANK L. BROWN

Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

THIS Convention, held at Buffalo, June 19th to 26th, brought together over two thousand paid delegates; representing every province in Canada and every State in the Union, excepting Texas and Montana. Over one hundred and sixty speakers emphasized the theme, "Thy Kingdom Come," from platform and in the many conferences. From the opening Convention sermon by Dr. George Caleb Moore, pastor of the Baptist Temple of Brooklyn, to the closing address at the Broadway Auditorium where 7,000 people listened to Governor Whitman speak on the "Patriotic Passion," the part which the Sunday school is to play in bringing in that Kingdom found continued emphasis.

Patriotism of the highest type, because of loyalty to the highest ideals, was vigorously presented in the addresses of Governor Pattison, Margaret Slattery, Captain MacNeil, Prof. Athearn and others.

When Mr. W. C. Pearce asked how many of the delegates were attending an International Convention for the first time, nearly two-thirds of the great audience arose, a revelation of that new interest in religious education which is sweeping over the country. Many of the number were young people.

If the Convention majored in any one thing above another, it was in the insistence that the Sunday school, in its work of religious education, should lay a foundation just as thorough for character building as the public school does for mind-building. While just as great emphasis as ever was placed upon the life and influence of the teacher in this process, the materials and the methods of teaching came in for special attention. The curriculum, the training of teachers, the standardizing of schools, the preparation of a leadership in community institutes and Christian institutions, the adequate supervision of the Sunday school work in the local community, the state and nation—these were lifted into prominence. But no less emphasis was given to the personal equipment of the teacher through a vision of Christ and a love for the pupil, and to evangelism as the great objective of the teacher's task. Soul building should be more carefully prepared for than body building, or mind building, or house building, or business building.

Prof. Athearn of Boston University and Prof. Honeline of Bonebrake Seminary gave the two great messages on religious education and their conferences were crowded to the doors. One other great interest came in for special attention. It was that of the Young People's Division—that great sweep of life from thirteen to twenty-four, which ten years ago was the weakest section in the Sunday school machinery, but is today possibly the strongest.

John L. Alexander pointed to the fact that in the last five years over forty thousand classes of young people in the teen years had been organized in the United States and Canada; that in the last ten years a rich literature had been produced for the helping of workers for young people and that nearly a million of young people were now in the Sunday schools, training for leadership for the Sunday school, the Church, the community and the world. He spoke of the Lake Geneva Training School, where four hundred bright young people were annually gathered for leadership training for the various state, county and city young people's divisions. He called attention to the thousands of institutes for young people promoted by the International Association.

The Young People's Conference at the Convention was one of the best attended in the whole series. Six hundred workers met for a number of afternoons to listen to experts in dealing with the problem of these swift moving years.

Again and again the temperance and prohibition note was struck and ringing declarations to the President and Congress as to the imperative necessity for prohibition, and for conservation of grain used in liquor manufacture, were passed by the convention.

One of the great evenings of the convention was Sunday June 23d. This was World's Sunday School Association night. Elmwood Hall was filled. The flags of the Allied Nations were displayed on the platform. One of the touching sights that night was the way these and other Sunday school leaders—some of them well in the seventies—showed their affection for each other and their enthusiasm for the great cause to which they had given so many years as Master-builders.

When on that Sunday evening, Poling Chang of Tientsin, China, spoke on "The Sunday School and the Chinese Democracy," the audience sat in breathless attention. Many were deeply affected by his story of his conversion and his subsequent devotion as an educator to the uplift of China. Then Mr. J. G. Holderoft, Sunday School Secretary for Korea, set out the work of the Sunday school in that land which enrolls now 200,000. In five years it has brought 25,000 from so-called heathen Sunday schools into the Sunday school army.

Geo. H. Trull gave the message for South America, showing its helplessness under past conditions of church misrule and its hopefulness through Geo. P. Howard's work in building up the Sunday schools of a continent. The great audience listened wonderingly to Mr. Warren's romantic story of the preservation through the efforts of some of America's Sunday school workers of the Samaritan remnant, now about 160 souls, worshipping still at Nablous, where for centuries they have preserved the traditions of their race and kept alive the story of the good Samaritan.

Marion Harland's Corner

Cheerful Chat with Constituents

THE batch of letters piled upon my desk this bright morning suggests irresistibly our alliterative caption. A philanthropist with a heart that has retained tenderness through all the years of labor for the good of his kind, offered as a title for this department when the design was still inchoate—"THE COMFORT CORNER." He added, "Surely the women of our country were never more in need of comfort and counsel than now."

I have had his beautiful thought in mind whenever I have opened, read and replied to letters which assure me that my sister-women are one in heart and purpose with each other and with me in the desire to bring comfort to the best and most enduring kind into the hearts and lives of their respective households. And—here is the most encouraging fact of all: that they recognize the value of little things in the work. A great poet wrote of a woman who lived out this principle until the busy hands were folded in death:

She doeth little kindnesses
Which most leave undone or despise;
For nought that sets one heart at ease
Or giveth happiness and peace
Is low-esteemed in her eyes.

I could write pages from the text. In humbler style we will chat together of worries and puzzles (which do not always mean the same thing!) and help one another to see tiny rifts in clouds through which we get glimpses of the invariable "silver lining." Which lining, I pause to observe, is often the discovery that so many are ready and glad to make rough places smooth for us.

"Some of us are watching anxiously for the promised ways of using cold potatoes. My children pronounce them 'just horrid.' Yet it is against rules and bargains to throw them away.

"MOTHER OF FOUR (Ohio)."

The children may change their minds if you cook the "horrors" as directed in the following recipes:

A Few of Many Ways of Cooking Cold Potatoes

Creamed Cold Potatoes

Set aside a heaping cupful of cold boiled potatoes cut into dice half-an-inch square. Heat in your double boiler a pint of milk (not forgetting a pinch of soda) and a chopped onion of fair size, bringing to a boil and strain out the onion. Return in the double boiler to the fire and stir into the milk a roux made by cooking a tablespoonful of butter in one of flour and a teaspoonful of minced parsley.

Stir and cook to the consistency of eustard, and add the potato-dice. Season with salt and pepper, and as soon as the potatoes are hot, turn all into a greased pudding-dish, strew fine crumbs thickly over the top, dotted with butter, and brown in a good oven.

Potato Succotash

This will utilize, and agreeably, more than one summer "left-over." To a cupful of cold boiled corn cut from the cobs, add an equal quantity of cold boiled potatoes cut into small dice. If you chance to have a spoonful of lima beans left from yesterday's dinner, let them go in too. Have ready in a frying-pan a tablespoonful of nice dripping or other substitute for butter, heated to a sizzle. Stir your "succotash" in and season to taste. Then turn and toss the blend until it is smoking hot, and serve.

Potatoes à la Lyonnaise

Cut cold boiled potatoes into dice of uniform size. Heat in a frying-pan two large spoonfuls of butter (or a substitute) and when it bubbles lay in a thinly-sliced onion and cook for three minutes after the bubble begins again. Take out the onion with a skimmer, or a split spoon, and slip the potato-dice into the hissing fat. Toss and turn with a fork or split spoon, that the potato dice may not sear or brown. When they are heated through, stir in a teaspoonful of very finely chopped parsley and toss and turn for another full minute. Take up the potatoes with a perforated skimmer, that the fat may drip from them. Serve very hot and dry.

This is, perhaps, the most popular preparation of warmed-over potatoes with which we are familiar in America.

And this, perhaps, the simplest, but savory.

Potatoes and Corn

Cut the kernels from six ears of cold boiled corn. Cut six cold potatoes into small dice of equal size. Put into a frying-pan a tablespoonful of butter (so-called) and when it is hot, turn potatoes and corn into it with salt and pepper to taste. Fry, tossing and turning constantly until the mixture is very hot and slightly browned. Serve in a heated dish.

"Please tell me if rolled oats may be cooked as you direct us to prepare oatmeal porridge? If not, how?"

MARY S. (Michigan).

Rollled Oats

Wash a cup of rolled oats well, and drain in a colander. Put them, then, into the inner vessel of a double boiler; add a cup of warm (not hot) water with a little salt. Cover closely, set in the outer vessel nearly full of hot water and boil slowly for two hours at least, stirring several times from the bottom. Beat up well before dishing to be sure it is of even consistency all through.

Leaving Out the Meat

"While my husband and I are not vegetarians in the strict sense of the word, we are firm believers in what you and other authorities upon Dietetics have affirmed again and again—namely, that we Americans eat much more meat than is good for us. Certainly far more than is good for our pockets just now. I am sending you what we call a "Lenten Soup," of which we are fond. Our doctor tells us it is also a blood-purifier. It is certainly palatable and refreshing on hot days.

"Lenten Soup" (A Blood-Purifier)

Cut with a sharp knife—(do not chop or bruise!)—a handful, each, of fresh green sorrel and of water-cresses. Cover with two quarts of boiling water. Peel and cut into dice a carrot, a good-sized onion, and two potatoes; also two slices of stale bread and add to the vegetables. Set over the fire and cook slowly until all are soft and reduced to the consistency of mush. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Stir frequently as the vegetables soften. Cook for two hours at least.

If you have at hand the liquor in which beef or mutton has been boiled, use it instead of the water. Then, of course, it ceases to be a Lenten Soup.

MRS. I. M. N. (Pennsylvania).

Anything that lessens the National consumption of meats without injury to the health and comfort of the household, is heartily welcomed by sensible Cornerites. We all confess to one another that our tables were never so plainly furnished before. If we are imbued with the right patriotic spirit, we are thankful for the opportunity of doing something daily toward helping on the glorious ends for which our brave lads at the front are fighting. Our great grandmothers of the Revolution dried huckleberry leaves and used them as tea, rather than submit to iniquitous taxation.

Trifles like this gain historic dignity as the ages go on. Let this be our introduction to a meatless dish contributed in the nick of time by one who has tried it and testifies to its worth:

Cheese Polenta

One cup of ground or grated cheese; one cup of milk; salt and pepper and flour for a rather thick batter. Beat light one large or two small eggs and add to the batter. Have plenty of fat in a frying pan. (Any vegetable-oil will do). Pour in the batter and with a spatula or small cake-turner, treat as you would scramble eggs. If browned a little it is better. An excellent meat substitute. Eggs and cheese in about equal quantities of each, scrambled, are also good.

Mrs. Q. (Idaho).

Here is a final and unique suggestion anent the much-talked-of "Garbage Pail." A Village Improvement Society, with advanced economic principles, might take it up. Goat's milk is very wholesome and the cheese made from it is excellent.

"You have several times given a cordial invitation to Cornerites to send in 'hints' and bits of experience. I hope you will not think mine absurd? I think the most sensible way of disposing of the parings of potatoes, carrots, radishes, turnips, etc., would be to feed this collected garbage to a herd of milk goats owned by some city or state institution. I believe they would even eat the pineapple hulls!"—A NEW MEMBER (New Jersey).

Tooth Brushing Is Not Folly

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

The Fault Is This:

It is true that the tooth brush has proved disappointing. Millions of people find that brushed teeth still discolor and decay.

Tartar forms, despite the brushing. Pyorrhea is alarmingly common. Statistics show that tooth troubles are constantly increasing.

Every dentist knows the reason. It lies in a slimy, clinging film. The ordinary dentifrice does not dissolve it. It gets into crevices, hardens and stays, and resists the tooth brush; and it causes nearly all tooth troubles.

That film is what discolors—not your teeth. It hardens into tartar. It holds food which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So that film which the tooth brush leaves is the thing that wrecks the teeth.

Science has for years sought ways to end it. That way has now been found. Four years of clinical tests have proved it to many able authorities.

That way is now embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. You can prove it for yourself, and quickly. And for that purpose we offer you a One-Week tube to try.

Watch the Film Go

Try Pepsodent for one week at our cost. You will gain a new idea of teeth-cleaning. You will know that the tooth-brush need not fail.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to constantly prevent its accumulation.

The great difficulty lay in the fact that pepsin must be activated. The usual method is an acid, harmful to the teeth. But science now has found a harmless activating method. Five governments have already granted patents. That method, employed in Pepsodent, makes possible today an effective pepsin dentifrice.

Dental authorities have made thousands of tests, and have proved it in every way. Now we are asking everyone to prove it in the home.

Send the coupon for a One-Week tube. Use it like any tooth paste and watch results. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Note the absence of the film. See how teeth whiten as the fixed film disappears.

Do this to learn what really clean teeth mean. Prove for yourself that this great tooth-destroyer can be easily defeated. You will then, we believe, forever adopt this new teeth-cleaning method. Cut out the coupon now.

Adventures in Neighboring

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them Into Practice

"PERHAPS," began an apologetic little letter which recently came to my desk, "you won't consider this adventure in neighboring worth publishing, since it only helped one family. You see, I've never done anything for my community."

I sat looking at the letter, and wondering. I wondered how many of us were thus belittling the little everyday kindnesses being performed by us; how many of us thought we were "helping our community" only when we were repairing a school or a church or a road, forgetting that, before any neighborhood can unite in such an effort, there must first exist, between all the members of it, a comradely affection built up through the years by little acts of neighborly kindness!

Dear comrades, let us remember that the word "neighbor" is a big and broad one: including every loving act from the feeding of a famished kitten to the founding of a great Community Club. No loving service is too great or too humble to be an "adventure in neighboring." All play their part in the up-building of the community life.

To illustrate what I mean, I am publishing today some simple, homely "adventures" which (despite their apparent unimportance) were as much of a blessing to the community in which they occurred as a new fountain would have been, or a statue, or any other contribution to the community's welfare.

Our first adventure, for instance, describes how a little group of young folks with love and compassion in their hearts solved a delicate problem which the town (as a town) could never have solved.

Young Folks Rescue a Companion

I want to tell you about an "Adventure in Neighboring" that brought a young girl back to the right path, from which she had wandered to a dangerous point.

She came to live in our community from a place whose nearness made it possible for her reputation to precede her, as bad reputations have a habit of doing. And the sad thing about it was, that she seemed to be as "wild" as her reputation claimed her to be.

She had unfortunately fallen in with evil companions, in a near-by town, where she went for her amusements; frequently going to questionable pleasure resorts, which tended to lower more and more her standards of morality. She had grown so bold and careless as to be almost repulsive to refined people. And she had reached that state of defiance and indifference where parents had no influence over her. Her condition seemed hopeless.

But did those new neighbors shrink from her and abandon her to her fate? No. Under the leadership of one dear, sweet girl, they went to the rescue. The whole crowd surprised her one evening in her home, and made her understand that a welcome awaited her in their circle. This new sincerity and kindness brought tears to her eyes. She afterward said those tears melted the ice in her heart. But perhaps the knowledge that those true, wholesome young people were offering her friendship had a warning effect also.

Nor did she ever have occasion to doubt that friendship. She was never left out because she was not "fit" company. And on evenings when her old associates were most apt to claim her, those friends planned (sometimes on a moment's notice) to have some attraction in the neighborhood.

Little by little she was led and lifted upward. It was not an instantaneous transition. Many and many were her lapses into the old way. And at times she seemed even to resent the approaches of her friends. But they were patient and hopeful. Never was a word of reproach spoken, or anything like advice given unasked for. She was led, not by sermon, but by example to see and be ashamed of her folly and to admire the lives of those who proved such true friends.

No one would think, now, to watch her face—full of enthusiasm—as she conducts a literary meeting or a Young People's Society that she has had a past to live down. But to those who know, it proves anew that of all the virtues "the greatest of these is Charity."

V—, C—.

I need not point out, dear adventurers what that act of loving kindness meant to the community in which it occurred. Strictly speaking, it was really a "community adventure," although performed for an individual, by a few young people, in such a quiet way.

Our next adventure seemed even more personal; and yet who can say how great or small an influence it had upon the neighborhood? Certainly it had a tremendous influence upon the woman who experienced it.

A Lesson in Neighboring

I wonder if any of you have had an experience like mine? I moved into a neighborhood wholly strange to me. I came from the city, where my narrow outlook had been limited to a few neighbors who prided themselves upon their dignity. Borrow or ask a favor of each other, we never did!

Just across from my new home was a small cottage, occupied by a widow and little son. I had never met her, so you may imagine my surprise when she came around to my side entrance early one morning, carrying a paper package and a small kettle.

"Good morning," said I rather stiffly.

"Good morning," she said. "I am your neighbor from the cottage over the way, and I came to ask if you would pick over my beans? I have them here."

I stared at her in indignation, but before I could utter a word, she continued:

"You see, I am blind; and the woman who lived here before you was so kind that I ventured to trespass upon you."

For a moment I was glad she could not see the shame in my face, as I brought her in, picked over her beans, and asked her to call me whenever I could be of service.

I found her a lovely and cultured woman, whose companionship more than offset anything I may have done for her.

Since then, by learning to know and serve my neighbors, I have gained a wholly new outlook upon life.

Mrs. T. K. S.

What an inspiring way in which to learn a lesson, to profit by it, and go on! And what a beautiful tribute to neighboring that blind woman's trust was!

The account that comes next also has to do with a newcomer and an old resident; but this time there was no awakening necessary. Both women were fully aware of the joys of neighboring, and only too eager to be tasting them.

Village Neighbor Welcomes a Country One

A very unassuming country woman was leaving the farm for a village; because her son's profession called him there. She had been so zealous for her son's education, that she had neglected her own social duties until she felt timid at the prospect of having to mingle with strangers. So she had concluded that she would not like town life or town people.

She and her son arrived at their new home about noon; and the mother said: "Son, let's eat a bite of this cold lunch. Perhaps by suppers time we'll have the stove up, so I can cook a good warm supper." The son's answer was to raise his hand. "Mother, there's someone calling."

Sure enough, from outside there came the call: "Will you please come out to the fence?"

The voice was kindly; and the tired mother, on looking, saw a lady with a bowl in her hand. Astonished, she hurried out to the fence, where she was greeted by a cheery: "You are Mrs. S—, I believe. I'm your next door neighbor, Mrs. M. I knew you would be tired and busy, so I brought over this bowl of soup and some rolls. They're warm; so you had better run along and eat them. I'll come over after dinner and help you get things straightened out. Good-bye."

Were town people friendly and neighborly, like this? To make a long story short, this one act of kindness changed the little newcomer's idea of town life, and had a lot to do towards making her feel at ease in the new town. It was, besides, the beginning of a lasting friendship.

Miss F. R.

A bowl of hot soup and some warm rolls! A very simple gift, perhaps? And yet a whole life was changed thereby, and to the community was added another loyal resident instead of a lonely and rebellious one.

Which brings us, neighbors, to our last adventure for the day, a very appealing one which, apparently, benefited only one family; but which in reality united a whole community in bonds of unselfish interest and love.

Equipping a Young Nurse

Three years ago, one of our neighbor's daughters had the opportunity to go to a nurse's training school in a distant city. The family was very large, and was poor: only the father being a wage earner. So some of the ladies met and sewed for this girl who was to go away: making underclothing, plain dresses, aprons, etc.. A good second-hand suit was given her. One lady donated writing paper, pad and stamps; another fancy collars, handkerchiefs, night dresses and handbag. (This last woman was 50, and unmarried, but she remembered her own girlhood. And she knew that a girl liked to have the things others had.) Two or three afternoons were given to the sewing, and finally the pastor's wife went as traveling companion, seeing the girl located in the school. She is now a graduate nurse, and is paying for another sister's High School education, besides helping the home folks, so the brother will not be obliged to be a farm laborer, as the father has always had to be. He can learn a trade. Who can say that this was not a true "adventure in neighboring?" NEIGHBOR.

Who can, indeed? No one! For no sweeter, more delightful adventure in neighboring could possibly be described!

And now, fellow adventurers, until our meeting two weeks hence, I must say goodbye to you, with this parting hint, that we are going to take up, at that next meeting, a subject very dear to our hearts. What is it to be? That, I shall not reveal. But I shall look for all of you—all your familiar faces—at that gathering in the World Hall of the Christian Herald.

The Neighbors' Forum

"Dear Miss Connolly: I saw in the Christian Herald of July 3d the request of a woman, who was deaf and lonely, to be put in touch with deaf people. I thought perhaps we might interest her, and other Christian Herald readers, in an old lady who lives with her son on top of a mountain near here. A party of ladies walked up one afternoon, and it was pitiful to see her pleasure at having visitors. By going close to her and shouting in her ear, and by signs, we could make her understand. She is fond of flowers and has them growing around, protected from her chickens. Perhaps some of your readers could cast gleams of sunshine upon her lonely life. Her name and address are enclosed." NEIGHBOR.

(Dear Neighbors: Here is an appeal to which I hope you will respond. Indeed, I know you will, as no appeal which ever goes out through this column is ignored. Address her, in my care, and I will see that your letters are promptly forwarded to her.—VERA L. CONNOLLY.)

"Because of the need of more extra time for knitting and other war work, we decided this spring to simplify our housekeeping. We removed all except necessary furnishings, even dishes seldom used were packed away. This eliminated a large part of our cleaning and dusting. We are now conserving sunshine and enlarging our perspective by curtainless windows—only shades being allowed to regulate them. Ours is a country home, and so now—instead of the curtains—each window is a beautiful transparency: a view of wooded hills, of slopes and hedges, with bird neighbors flitting by on housekeeping errands. Perhaps, after all, the solution of a good many problems may be reached by simplifying our living habits." A. R. (Minnesota).

"I used to be a teacher, but am married now. Nevertheless I have some very lonely days. My hearing is defective, and as I am very sensitive about it, I have never tried to go among people very much, as it embarrasses me so."—Mrs. W. C. T.

The Fighting Pastor of '76

PASTOR WILLIAM L. PIEPLOW in an address delivered at the dedication of a Service Flag of the St. Jacobi Evangelical Lutheran Church, in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, told the following incident in the life of the famous Pastor Peter Muhlenberg:

"Peter Muhlenberg, at twenty-nine, preached to congregations scattered along the Virginia frontier. He was a friend of Patrick Henry, and went hunting with George Washington. After the farmers of Lexington fired the 'shot heard round the world,' he determined to enlist and was chosen colonel of the Eighth Regiment. Muhlenberg had no military knowledge, but his character and bearing proclaimed him a man to be trusted in command. He set about raising a regiment, and on his arrival at Woodstock his different congregations were notified that he would deliver his farewell sermon to them on the following Sunday.

"It was about the middle of January, 1776, and the rude country church was filled to overflowing with the hardy people of the mountains. Even the churchyard was filled with stern, excited men. Pastor Muhlenberg arrived. About his shoulders was his clerical gown. After stirring his congregation with the wrongs the people had suffered, he said:

"In the language of Holy Writ, there's a time for all things—a time to preach and a time to pray, but those times have passed away."

"Then in a voice which rang through the church like a trumpet, he cried:

"There's a time to fight—and that time has now come!"

"Thereupon he stripped the clerical gown from his shoulders and stood before his people a girded warrior! Descending from the pulpit he ordered the drums to beat, and his people gathered about him in enthusiastic, patriotic devotion. Nearly 300 men of the frontier churches were that day enlisted under the banner of Muhlenberg."

Pastor Pieplow's church, St. Jacobi, has given fifty-two of her sons to the country's service.

REO

Looks Like Camouflage

But It Is Just the Reflection of the Surroundings
In the Highly Finished Body of the New Reo Light Four

Referring of course, to the cut of the car at the bottom of the page.

Usually we retouch photographs of this kind to eliminate the reflections. That is what gives the average automobile illustration such a lifeless look.

Here is Reo beauty unadorned—the car is shown just as photographed, with the rippling road reflections in the mirror-like finish of the Reo.

And that outward beauty is a fitting cover—just as it is indicative of—the internal excellence of this newest product of the Reo plants.

Mechanically, this Light Four is the epitome of Reo experience and skill.

The Four is the ideal type of automobile for these times.

The ruggedness that is inherent in the four-cylinder principle and especially in Reo motors;—

The freedom from "temperamental ills" to which the poly-cylinder cars are subject;—

The accessibility, the simplicity and the absolute interchangeability of parts;—

These render the Reo owner singularly free from the necessity of calling upon the garage man.

Skilled mechanics are scarce just now—Uncle Sam is using them in his war work.

Those that are available come high—and for the same reason.

The owner who can care for his own car is doing double duty.

So perfect is the interchangeability of this Reo, you yourself can, without any mechanical experience and with the most meagre mechanical understanding, make any adjustment or replace any part—at the expense of a suit of allovers.

In building more of this Light Four Model at this time we had these very conditions in mind.

The Dependability that is Reo is your guarantee from pesky little troubles and vexatious delays.

That Reo factor of safety "50% oversize" in all vital parts—driving shafts, gears, axles, bearings, etc.—is your guarantee against major troubles.

That buyers appreciate these qualities is evidenced in a demand greater than the possible output.

Our problem is not to sell, but to make enough of them.

They are coming faster now, and if your order is in your Reo dealer's hands at once he can promise you a reasonably early delivery.

But don't delay—today won't be a minute too soon.

P. S.—We feel we ought to suggest that it behooves the prospective buyer, nowadays more than ever, to look carefully into the resources, financial and otherwise, and especially the sources of supply, of concerns whose product is offered to him. If you neglect this, you may find yourself a year hence with no source from which to obtain replacement parts—no manufacturer to stand back of the "guarantee."

Reo Motor Car Company, Lansing, Mich.

Young People's Topics for August 11

Is There Anything I Cannot Forgive?

Epworth League Topic. Mark 11: 25; Luke 17: 3, 4; Eph. 4: 32

ONE of the foundation stones of Christian character is forgiveness. It is perhaps the hardest stone for most of us to fit into the structure of our lives. All that is in us rebels against the forgiving of a wrong. Some of us think we have reached a measure of perfection when we say we can forgive but cannot forget; yet memory of the wrong inevitably carries with it a measure of the sting. So long as memory persists, forgiveness is not complete; yet every time we pray as our Saviour taught us we ask Him not merely to forgive our sins, but to forgive them as we forgive the sins of others against us. It is one of the most important articles of our faith that our sins are remembered against us no more.

They are blotted out of the "book of remembrance." The three verses which are the references for this lesson are significant. The first tells us when we stand praying to forgive if we have aught against any, in other words: the ability to put away from remembrance the wrongs done us and to forgive them, is the pinion on which our prayer wings its way heavenward. We are told that if our brother sin against us and repent, we are to forgive him, even though his sin be committed and repented of seventy times seven, and we are told also to forgive those who sin against us, even as our Father in heaven, for Christ's sake, has forgiven us. It hardly seems necessary to dwell upon these references; they are complete in themselves; and even if we are not told definitely that we must forgive those who sin against us and do not repent, yet surely we must be ready to forgive them as God, for Christ's sake is ready to forgive us when repenting of our sin as penitents we come humbly before Him.

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. Prov. 6: 8; John 12: 24, 25

WHILE man is supreme over all creation, he is not necessarily superior in all things to the other creatures which God has made. In fact, man has much to learn from these whose life he can so easily extinguish. The writer of Proverbs points the sluggard to the ant. The writer of the Gospels shows Christ using a grain of corn, which dies that it may live again, as a symbol of His spirit and His sacrifice. What shall we say of the rock that faces unmoved the surging seas of centuries? Is it like our faith? Or of the oak, which grips the earth with its roots and defies the elements with its branches? Does it typify our life in Christ? Or of the bee, which, in the world of struggle, stores up only sweets; or of the lily, rooted in the mud of the perennial swamp which turns to the heavens the unsullied face of a perfect flower; or of the swallow which, with infinite care, builds a nest for her young; or of the fruit tree, which blossoms prodigally in the Spring, reeking nothing of the drought which may come with Summer to wither the fruit; or of the grass, which, being constantly cut, as constantly renews its attempt to bear its seed head? Yet in all these things there is a lesson for those who strive in the spirit of Christ to make their lives bear a larger fruitage in this world and a larger outreach into the world beyond.

THE CAPTURE OF JERUSALEM

By REV. A. E. THOMPSON

Pastor of the American Church at Jerusalem (driven by the Turk from the Holy City at the outbreak of the World War). At present Field Secretary for the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief.

"The capture of Jerusalem is one of those events to which students of prophecy have been looking forward for many years. Even before Great Britain took possession of Egypt, there were keen-sighted seers who foresaw the day when God would use the Anglo-Saxon peoples to restore Jerusalem. When the war broke out, there were some of us who were convinced that it would never end until Turkish tyranny was for ever a thing of the past in the Holy City. When the city was captured, we felt very confident we could put one hand upon this great event which had stirred the heart of the whole Christian world, and, laying open our Bible at many places in the Prophets, say as confidently as Peter on the day of Pentecost, 'This is that which was spoken by the prophets.'

"The capture of Jerusalem is more than a prophetic event—it is a pivot in prophecy. The Germans might enter Paris and we would weep; but, desperate as that event would be, it would only be an incident in the great panorama of the ages. The flags we love might be carried into Berlin, and how we would rejoice!

But even that would only be an incident. The Hun might again sack Rome, but not one of us could with any assurance put our finger upon any text of Scripture and say it was so written. Constantinople might fall, and a babel of voices would be heard among our prophets. But when Jerusalem was captured, we all said with one consent, 'This is the climax of the ages.' We have entered a prophetic era. We are looking upon the things which Moses, and the prophets, and Christ Himself have foretold.

"The capture of Jerusalem is not the end, but the beginning. Now, if the hour of the passing of the Turk from Palestine has come, it means great things to the Promised Land. It marks the beginning of the end of the desolation. It means also the beginning of the end of the dispersion.

"Again the capture of Jerusalem indicates that we are at the beginning of the end of the declaration of the gospel. The capture of Jerusalem also meant the defeat of German design. And finally, the capture of Jerusalem marked the beginning of the end of all imperialism."

The above is an extract from Dr. Thompson's address at the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference. The complete address, together with all the other 18 addresses, is given in HERE is a sweetness about clothes washed with Ivory Soap that reminds one of the fragrance of a clover field. This is because—

Ivory's rich, copious, bubbling, lively lather cleans them thoroughly.

It rinses so easily that not a particle of the suds remains in the fabric.

And, most important, it has the pleasant, unobtrusive, clean odor of the highest grade materials of which soap can be made.

Not even Nature's own purifiers—sun, air and water—can counterfeit the distinctive freshness which makes the Ivory washed garment such a satisfaction.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

Refugees, thronging the gates of a soup kitchen in Jerusalem, await their daily rations

I HAVE been about two days in the Holy City and what follows will describe some of the things I have seen. To a large extent, it reminds me of the trip I took through Belgium in 1914, though of course, there is here not the devastation of houses which was so evident there in those early days. But there is misery among the people—the misery that follows lack of sustenance and disease. It is not as bad as it was, for the military authorities have done wonders in alleviating suffering; but even they have not been able thoroughly to clean up the Augean stables left behind by the Turk. Furthermore, it does not appear so much on the surface. It is the same old Jerusalem on superficial observation as it ever was. But as you walk through the city and get close to the people, you can come upon enough want and forlornness to last you many a day.

Soon after my arrival, I wandered down to the Jaffa Gate and entered the walled city. Almost the first things I saw was a poster announcing the lace industry of the American Colony, supported by the Christian Herald Relief Fund. It will be remembered that just before the beginning of the war the Christian Herald contributed some thousands of dollars to be used in conducting a lace industry for the purpose of giving work to the poor women of Jerusalem. The work was started at once and hundreds of women began to earn a livelihood making lace. The lace was to be sent to America and sold, and the money received was to be sent back to Jerusalem and used for the purpose of buying more raw materials and paying wages for the perpetuation of the industry. But the war stopped all that, as it became impossible to ship the lace to America. The Turk being in control, the business stagnated and would have disappeared altogether had not the Allies driven the Turk out of the city and far to the north, where he has been retreating ever since. But the British soldier, with an eye to sending some suitable souvenir to the folks at home, was not slow in buying up the lace that had already been made, and with the return therefrom the American Colony was able to carry on the industry.

Relief Work in Jerusalem

By MAJOR THEODORE WATERS

Member of the American Red Cross Commission to Palestine

THIS letter from Palestine brings good news—news that will be welcomed by our readers. The relief work begun by the Christian Herald in Jerusalem early in the war has not been swept away during the long period when communications necessarily ceased. Instead, it has been greatly blessed and multiplied. In the hands of a little company of earnest, self-sacrificing, capable Christian people, it has become the means of helping thousands of sufferers in their time of deep distress. This work is still going on, as Major Waters tells us. It is a bright spot among the sadder and darker aspects of the Holy City.

So that, almost from his entrance, the British Tommy was the means of providing succor for poor people who were in danger of seeing their only means of livelihood disappear.

MRS. BERTHA VESTER, who was in charge of the industry, had broad visions of its development, and, in addition to employing as many women as possible, she started a plan for teaching lace-making to the young girls, who, since the double occupation, had been left to run the streets. The word was passed along, and immediately more children came than could be accommodated. And this was greatly to be commended, for, under the terrifying conditions which had existed before the entrance of the Allied forces, prostitution, which had not been common in Jerusalem, had begun to run rampant, and so many a young girl was saved from a worse fate than that which follows mere want.

I saw these lace-makers at work and I was told that there was hardly one of them who had not others dependent upon her. When they entered the industry, months ago, the marks of want and privation were apparent all over them. There were gaunt faces aplenty, and their clothing was for the most part filthy rags, and when each applied for work, it was but too evident that others with equally gaunt faces and garments of rags awaited the outcome at home. And such homes! Unspeakable dens, of which I shall tell you later!

But while the city is full of just such pitiful creatures who have not yet been helped, those who were at work bore the evidence in their comparatively happy faces of what just a little charity, properly dispensed, can do for the uplift of the poor and miserable. The Colony itself, as distinct from the Colony Store, is situated a short way from the poorer part of the town. The buildings are fine and well kept, and the sun shines in brightly all day long. In one room we saw the little children learning under competent instructors how to construct the really marvelous bits of lace and embroidery which have now a ready market. In other rooms were the workers themselves, each bent over her task and each sure of the compensation that accrues at the end of the week. In still other rooms we saw many women who, unable to be absent from their children at home for any length of time, had brought in work which they had finished in those homes, and were now to receive payment for the work done and obtain raw material, thread, etc., to be made up into the finished product. And because the amount paid might not be sufficient to sustain their families, all of these workers are given a ration ticket with which they can obtain free food from the soup kitchens which it has been found necessary to operate all over town. These soup kitchens are operated, some by the authorities and some by the Syrian and Palestine Relief Fund; and if you could see the people, and especially the little children, who come for the rations, you would believe that the kitchens are the only things that stand between them and starvation.

I WENT with Mr. Wendell Cleland, of the Syrian and Palestine Relief Fund, to one of these kitchens and saw the people in line. The kitchen is located in some buildings that stand just across the way from the Tower of David. We made our way through the throng of waiting men, women and children. I called it a line just now, but throng is the better word, or perhaps mob would be even better. And what a mob! All sorts and conditions of people, diseaseridden as to themselves, vermin infested as to their rags. Arabs who looked as though they came from the desert; city dwellers who brought the smells of their hole-in-the-wall homes, with veils as a shield of their poverty; women clad in one-piece garments that looked ready to drop away from them, and little children—little children with their diseased eyes and their individual swarms of flies—quarreling and pushing one another for a more advantageous place near the gate. And all of them carrying pitchers and tin cans, anything they could get, to bear back to waiting relatives the only meal of the day.

We thought better of pushing our way through that crowd, not for the inconvenience of physical contact, but for what that physical contact might cause us to carry away with us. So we were conducted around to another door and into the yard, where there was another crowd similar in every respect to that without the gate. Once within reach of the great kettles of soup, they formed into the semblance of a line and each was recorded in a book, and each received the number of rations designated for the family to which he or she belonged. Then they crowded their way out. I watched one little boy—he could not have been more than seven years old—pushing his way into the open. At the entrance of the kitchen was a flight of stone steps. He maneuvered his big can of soup through the crowd until he got it to the steps, laid it down, and then jumping down at the side rescued it from the feet of those who were crowding in. It gave me a thought. "Suppose," I asked, "that little boy should happen to drop his can on the way home. What then?" "It has happened," was the reply. "And if we could prove it, he would be given another. But sometimes these people will report such an incident when in fact it has not happened at all. We just have to use our judgment."

OVER two thousand rations are distributed in this way every day at this kitchen, represented by about six hundred applicants. The need and the number of rations are investigated by workers who are self-sacrificing Christian young men and women, who have given up their home ties, and who work thus enthusiastically for the uplift of their fellow men, most of them without pay. It is an inspiring sight, to say the least. And this is only one of the soup kitchens in Jerusalem.

I wanted to follow the little boy with the big can of soup to his home and see just how these people lived, but I was not able to do it just then. However, I did have an opportunity a little later in the day to see into the homes of such people who needed soup. It came about in this way: There is a dearth of doctors in Jerusalem, that is, doctors of the up-to-date, efficient sort. And so the military health officer of the city asked one of our Red Cross doctors to make calls for him on some people who were reported ill and not able to go to the public dispensaries. He invited me to go along. And so, accompanied by a woman settlement worker, we started out.

WE entered the Old City through the New Gate and took our way down the crooked alleys which are called streets here. Some of these were covered ways, and on the roofs were stone hovels in which people lived out their lives. The stench of centuries was in the air of these tunnels. Strange people watched us curiously, and I thought resentfully, as we stepped gingerly along in our endeavor to avoid the filth under foot. The place seemed to be one long lavatory. After a while we came to an old door in the wall. Our woman worker, who had been there before, turned and pushed open the door and began mounting a flight of stone steps. They turned and curved and at last stumbled out upon an inclosure—or what might be called an elevated yard—around which was a collection of stone hovels. Everything is built of stone in this country. Faces appeared at the bleared windows of the hovels and then people began to come out of the doors. Evidently we were an event in the community. Going up to the closed door of one house, our worker pushed it open and peered within. A woman, with steeling hair and very little clothes, welcomed her and pointed to what I at first thought was a heap of rags on the floor. The woman touched it gently with her dirty bare foot. There was a convulsive moment of the heap. Some of the rags uplifted, and out peered the bearded face of an emaciated man. He looked curiously into the face of our woman worker, and then fearfully at the doctor, for the latter, being of the Red Cross, had on the uniform of a captain in the United States army, and the people, driven as they have been by Turks in uniform over on the lookout for extra taxes, look at all uniforms askance. Reassured, however, he told his symptoms and was prescribed for with as much dispatch as was consistent with an examination. There was but one room in this "house," and that room had probably been as it was for a thousand years. There was practically nothing in it as far as I could see; heaps of clothing in one corner, not a table, not a chair, but children, near naked, moving about under foot.

WE went out into the sunshine and over the sloppy stones preparatory to going down into the noisome alley below. Almost immediately the worker was besieged with petitions from women who had gathered about the door and who knew of other sick ones in the surrounding hovels and wanted them to be treated. It was not to be, however, as the authorities had designated a number of urgent cases, and these must be attended to first. So down we went again to the alley and along until we came to another door much like the first, and through into a courtyard of uneven levels and the usual amount of dirt. Women and children abounded of course, and they led us readily to the door of the house where a sick child awaited our ministrations. The worker and the doctor went in. I took a hasty look and concluded to wait outside.

The patient was a little boy—a very sick little boy, as any one would have known at a glance. He moaned and cried while the doctor diagnosed his malady. They had raised him from his pallet of rags, and the movement caused him to lose what little dinner he had evidently eaten. The doctor noticed that he had been eating bread, and said it was not just the thing for the little fellow to eat in his condition. But as bread, in limited quantities at that, was all the family could afford, the advice was lost. He indicated to the worker that the child would have to be taken to the hospital at once. Then there was a great uproar. Take to the hospital? No! No! No! They would butcher him at the hospital! This feeling, which is common among the poor all over the world, was quieted when it was explained that the boy would probably die if he were not taken to the hospital. Meantime the women, some of them with families in prospect, crowded around the door and the children ran around under foot. "Tell them to keep those women and children away from that child," said the doctor to the worker just before we left the place. "It is contagious." "What has he?" I asked as we wended our way through the alley. "He is coming down with typhus," replied the doctor sententiously. "But you will see more of it before we return."

AND we did, many cases. In fact, Jerusalem has not only many cases of typhus, but the doctors say the disease is on the increase. But why go on describing case after case of men, women and children down with infectious diseases? How can they help but be? Filth and squalor among the inhabitants, conditions unsanitary to the last degree. People living as they did a thousand years ago. It is not the fault of the present authorities. They have done all they can up to date to change matters for the better. But the job is huge—bigger in fact than one can appreciate without close investigation. It is the heritage left by past rulers. Centuries of fatalism and oppression have left the seal of their influence upon the people and they are not to be changed in a day. I could see it even in Egypt, which, as everybody knows, has improved wonderfully in the last decades; yet even there the lethargy of the East is all too apparent. No one there ever thinks of swatting one of the millions of flies that make life all but unbearable in the daytime, and this aside from the danger of disease transmission through this agency. Very few think of screening windows. People go around carrying fly-swishers (a decorative handle holding a wisp of horsehair) with which to chase the pestiferous insect on to some one else. And Egypt has progressed. Why should not more or as much be expected of Jerusalem?

WE came out of the old town through the Gate of Herod, and presently our guide remarked that over behind a little rise of ground was the Garden Tomb. Would we like to stroll that way? No, we did not think we would. Of course we shall go there very soon; but not on this day, when within less than a thousand yards of the tomb of Christ we had so lately watched so many men, women and children, the spoil of the centuries, being drawn down so remorselessly, as it seemed, into the pit of misery, disease and death.

However, it must not be surmised from the foregoing that there is nothing but gloom and misery in Jerusalem. It so happened that on my entrance to the Sacred City it was my portion to be shunted into those bypaths of hopelessness which it does not usually befall the occasional visitor or tourist to tread; and so, while I am calling it as forcibly as possible to your attention, in order to show how much Jerusalem really needs the help of the Christian world, there is another side which needs a glorious mention. That is the side which includes its deliverance from the Turks. Never has the city apparently been as happy as since the Turk was driven out, and the real wish of the people is that he never will be allowed to come back. Already the present army has started in to look after the welfare of the people. The roads have been improved and widespread sanitation is receiving large attention. The introduction of fresh running water is being arranged. The maladies and the foibles of the people are being treated from the humanitarian standpoint. The exorbitant system of taxes is abolished.

The people are learning that oppression has been suppressed, that they are privileged to live their own lives as well as they may, consistent with law and order. And the effect on the public mind is already apparent. Of course, I shall go into these phases of life here in future letters, and as I can become more intimate with the people themselves. In the meantime, I can see the vision of a new Jerusalem, I mean it in a civic sense, and I can see it also as the most wonderful shrine in the world, to which people from every part of the earth will come with wonder and delight to find their ideals fulfilled, and their reverence for the name of Christ exalted indeed.

Purposeful Prayer

THE sweet chimes sounded forth from the Miller Bell Tower and a man in uniform blew a bugle at the same moment at the Chautauqua Assembly, New York, on Monday, July 15, 1918, and Chautauqua witnessed a new custom. Men on the street and elsewhere stood still for a few moments, mostly with uncovered heads and closed eyes. Women stopped their knitting and sprang to their feet; they reverently bowed their heads. The newsboys no longer called out their papers. Dinner bells did not ring for a minute or two after twelve instead of on the instant as formerly.

Have you guessed the reason? Have you heard of the new custom? Well, the Woman's Club of Chautauqua requested the Institution to call upon every one to observe a few moments of silent prayer precisely at noon for our nation. The request met with prompt approval; and all persons at Chautauqua were asked to make this a time of prayer for a speedy and just victory; for our boys overseas; and for the country. Its first observance on the date mentioned was exceedingly impressive. The plan made a strong appeal. It is a fitting recognition of the "God of Hosts" and our dependence on him for guidance, comfort and strength.

A Little Boy's Journey Across Africa

THE children of missionaries are usually only incidental parts of family groups, or items in an annual report, but as to their impressions, their thoughts, their feelings, the world hears but seldom. Here is a story of mission work in Africa told by a missionary's son and transcribed by his father. In it we see, through a child's eyes, the trials and dangers and triumphs of a soldier of the Cross.

IT was not my choice that I should go to Africa, nor that I should zigzag across it on both sides of the equator. I was only eighteen months old when my Papa and Mamma entered Africa on the East Coast, and just past three when I passed into the heart of it, on my way across with them. So you see the first things I remember are about Mid-Africa. As it was in this central part of that great wild country that they lived most of the time, what I shall tell you will be about the things I saw while there.

If you will look on the map of Africa, you will see Mombasa marked on the east coast, and the mouth of the Congo on the west coast. My journey lay between these two points, not straight across, but in a big curve to the north, then curving again west and south. The first 900 miles of travel we could go by railroad or steamboat most of the way, but I do not remember that. After we crossed Uganda into Belgian Congo, we had months of hard traveling over native paths and by canoe into the country owned by the French. Everything there is so different from our own dear land that when on our way home we came out where many natives had become Christians, and the missionaries had good houses with furniture and pretty things in them, I thought we had got to heaven.

The first black people I remember about were the Aluru, who lived on the northwest coast of Lake Albert. They were very wild and bad. They would steal everything they could, and fight and kill each other. The Uganda people, just across the lake, had once been just as bad, but they had been changed by hearing about Jesus, and thousands of them had learned to read the Bible. It was easy to travel among them; but the Aluru, who had never heard of Jesus, gave us trouble all the time we were in their land.

One day my father was sitting under a tree studying on a native language, when a band of men came panting up the steep hill, and laid the hand of a man down on the ground in front of him. They were dripping with sweat, and the hand had just been cut off. When one of them got his breath, he exclaimed, "Behold, we went to visit the people of yonder village; we went as friends, but they have done us evil; they gave us battle and killed our brother."

THEY were told that we were not there to punish bad people, they must go where the officer was who would see to their trouble. But the officer said it was too far for him to go from his post, when there was no one to leave to take his place. So the angry black men gathered their friends together and went to fight the murderers and their friends. Soon we saw the tall columns of smoke where villages were burning, women and children running away to find safe places, and bands of men with spears and bows and arrows, fighting each other, and the natives about our grounds began to get wild, too. We had a boy named Atido to help in work about the hut, and he was about the best boy we knew in that place. One day, some one came to tell Atido that his mother's village was burning, and he must come and help her to get away.

One day a large band of men came to the mission station. They were armed with long spears and carried great big shields. They said that if the natives about the station did not go with them to battle against their enemies, they would fight them, and that was about the same as saying they would fight us. My father went out and told them they must go right away; they must not come on our grounds with spears and arrows, for we did not want our people to fight. The other white men were away that day making a road, and Mamma didn't quite know what all those natives would do to Daddy, so she took me by the hand, and we walked out toward them. Just then Daddy stooped down and picked up some little bits of pebbles and pieces of dirt and told them to go right quick, and the whole band, about a hundred, began to run away like deer. You never saw such running! They just leaped! Mamma says the natives must have thought we were being kept from danger by some great power, or, as they would say, "strong medicine." The black man believes much in spirits and charms. I never knew, till I came out of that wild country, that I was in any danger there. I did not know that anything or anybody would hurt me, and so I would laugh at the queer actions of the wild men. I loved to walk in the jungle just at nightfall, and I couldn't think what made Mamma and Daddy look so white and queer when they would find me, and their voices so out of breath when they said I must not do it. They talked about leopards. I wanted to see one, but I never did see one except a half-grown-up one that a Belgian officer had for a pet. That was lots bigger than I was, and too rough to be a nice pet.

The Aluru were not the only tribe that had never heard about Jesus, and were bad. Daddy found more than fifty tribes that had never heard, and some of them gave us a great deal of trouble. We stayed about three years with a tribe called Zande. The Zande were fierce warriors and cannibals. They filed their front teeth to sharp points, like crocodiles' teeth, to make them look fiercer, and when they went to fight other tribes they carried frightful knives with curved blades cutting both ways. When they rushed into battle flashing those sharp knives every way and showing their sharp white teeth as they yelled "Nyama, nyama," I should think half of their enemies would have been too scared to fight. They really ate up many of their conquered enemies, and made slaves of the rest. The Zande don't do this any more. I have sat on the lap of one of these old chiefs. He had eaten many people before the white people came to stop it, but I didn't think anything about it while I was on his lap.

IT seems wonderful how just believing in Jesus makes these people so different, so that we could like them so much. Some of our boys became so gentle and good that we felt badly to part with them.

When my father would come alone to one of the native villages, far from the main roads or paths, these wild people would sometimes all rush away into the tall grass or the forest. Sometimes only the women would run away with the children, and the men would wait to see what Daddy was going to do, or if he had a band of men behind him who might do them harm. But if Mamma and I were with him, they knew we had come as friends, and men, women and children would come running and calling to people in villages we could not see, to "come see the white child" (Mototo na mondele), for along much of the road we traveled no white child had ever been before, or even a white woman.

I always had to be carried, for even after I learned to walk, I couldn't go fast enough to keep up with the others. So I was carried in my bed, on the heads of two big black men. My father always picked the tallest of the porters to carry me, so my head would be out of the tall grass a little better. My bed had a high post at each corner, and a cover over it to keep off the sun and rain. It was a nice little bed, and I did love it!

Sometimes when we were traveling I was put to bed in it at night with no other roof over me but the starry sky, till they could find a place to stay; but I thought I was safe if I only had my bed. The porters were rather proud to carry a little white child, and though they might go slow where there was no one to see us, they would dash up in great style when we came to a village. Then the women and children would run out to see the strange white child. The women would want to take me in their arms and carry me a little way. It seems as if I was nearly always surrounded by a crowd of women and children. Almost the first question asked of the carriers would be, "Is it a boy or a girl?" You should have seen the pride with which they answered, "Ye mobari to?" ("Is he not a boy?") They would not have been so proud to carry a little girl. You see, the women and girls are bought and sold like animals. A good dog, brought from down the big river, sells in the Zande tribe for twenty spearheads as long as my arm, and a girl is sold for the same price. It takes the natives quite a while to understand that a white woman is as good as a white man.

WHEN we came to a village, Daddy would ask the people if they had yet heard the words of God, or the good news of the Son of God. In many, many tribes for hundreds and hundreds of miles, they would say, "We have not heard even a little." Daddy would then tell them that God who made the sun, moon and stars, the land, water, plants, animals and people, loved them, and had a very happy home where he wanted them to come and live with him. In his home nothing bad can come, but as the sun drives away the night, so God keeps all evil out of his home. No sickness nor death nor anything that can make any one feel bad can come into his home, but everything that will make one happy, for there all love each other and do nothing but good to each other. God wants to cleanse your hearts, so you will not be afraid of him and not dread to live with him in his home.

He would sometimes show them his handkerchief, and ask them if it would be fit to wipe his face with if he should first rub it in the dust and dirt. Of course they would say it wouldn't. He would then ask if he should throw it in the fire, and they would say, "No, no." "Why not?" he would say, "if it is all dirty and I cannot use it?" "Take it to the stream and wash it, and it will come good again," they would say. Then my father would tell them that that was the way God wanted to do with the badness of their hearts, he did not want to cast these bad people into the fire, but he wanted to wash them, and then they would be fit to live with him in his beautiful home. God has a way to cleanse their hearts, and he would explain it to them. I have heard him tell all this so many times!

If Daddy was alone when he came to a village, perhaps only the men were there to hear him. He would not ask them to call the women at first, for then they might think he wanted to steal them for his slaves and that he was a very bad man with an army close by, or that he had come to do some harm to them or the children. But as he would tell the men about the news so wonderful to them, they would drop their spears and sit close around him to listen. Then the women and children hidden in the "jamba" or bushes, close by the village, not hearing any noise of fighting, or cries of pain or anger, would come, little by little, closer and closer to see what new kind of "mondele" this was, that came to the black man's town and made no trouble of any kind.

WHEN these wild people believed what Daddy told them of what God had done for them, they were not afraid to put away their charms, and stop trusting in their witch doctors for help against wild animals, snakes and bad men, and against the wicked spirits which they believed caused them sickness and accidents. They would look to God for help instead. This made them much different from the other natives who kept on with their old ways. Daddy told them they could now speak to God, if they did so in the name of Jesus, and tell him just how they loved him for what he had done for them, and how they trusted in him to keep them from harm, and from doing wrong.

Some time I will try to tell you how we got through the deep swamps and over the deep raging rivers on the native pole bridges, which sometimes floated away with the rushing waters almost under our feet; and how we climbed over the mountains a mile or more high, sometimes. You may want to know how we were kept from the leopards and lions, whose tracks we walked in right up to the places where we slept at night, and although they came near us, they never attacked us. You may want to know how Daddy slept out in the jungle, when night came on and he could find no village, and about the many strange animals and birds, crocodiles and snakes. But most of all, I think, you will want to know more about the wild people of the great Congo forest and plain, and how these people learn to do so much better when they receive the Gospel. Even the little pygmies came to trust my father, and helped him for days with his loads.

President Wilson Would End Lynchings

PRESIDENT WILSON on July 26 addressed a personal statement to the public, in which he denounced the mob spirit and called upon the nation to give the lie to German propaganda by showing its ability to apply at home the democratic principles for which its sons are fighting in Europe.

The President said in part:

My Fellow Countrymen: I take the liberty of addressing you upon a subject which so vitally affects the honor of the nation and the very character and integrity of our institutions that I trust you will think me justified in speaking very plainly about it. I allude to the mob spirit which has recently here and there very frequently shown its head among us. There have been many lynchings and everyone of them has been a blow at the heart of ordered law and human justice. No man who loves America, no man who really cares for her fame and honor and character, or who is truly loyal to her institutions, can justify mob action while the courts of justice are open, and the governments of the States and the nation are ready and able to do their duty. We are at this very moment fighting lawless passion. Germany has outlawed herself among the nations, because she has disregarded the sacred obligations of law and has made lynchers of her armies. Lynchers emulate her disgraceful example.

"We proudly claim to be the champions of democracy. If we really are, in deed and truth, let us see to it that we do not discredit our own. I say plainly that every American who takes part in the action of a mob or gives any sort of countenance is no true son of this great democracy, but its betrayer. . . . How shall we commend democracy to the acceptance of other peoples if we disgrace our own by proving that it is, after all, no protection to the weak? Every mob contributes to German lies about the United States, what her most gifted liars cannot improve upon by the way of calumny. They can at least say that such things cannot happen in Germany except in times of revolution, when law is swept away!"

"I therefore very earnestly and solemnly beg that the Governors of all the States, the law officers of every community and, above all, the men and women of every community in the United States—all who revere America and wish to keep her name without stain or reproach—will co-operate, not passively merely, but actively and watchfully, to make an end of this disgraceful evil. It cannot live where the community does not countenance it.

"I have called upon the nation to put its great energy into this war and it has responded with a spirit and a genius for action that has thrilled the world. I now call upon it, upon its men and women everywhere, to see to it that its laws are kept inviolate, its fame untarnished. . . . I can never accept any man as a champion of liberty, either for ourselves or for the world, who does not reverence and obey the laws of our own beloved land, whose laws we ourselves have made. He has adopted the standards of the enemies of his country, whom he affects to despise.

"WOODROW WILSON."

DISAFFECTION MAY DEFEAT AUSTRIA. With the Czechoslovak army, all of them former units of Austria's army, forming the nucleus of Allied reconstitution of Russia, holding the Urals and the Volga, and the principal strategic centers across Siberia, the Entente has a most useful advantage over the disorganized Bolsheviks and the small German forces in Russia and the Ukraine, which face uprisings among the people they are misgoverning. And with the rapid desertions of Slavs and Czechs from her present armies, Austria is in no condition either to initiate another offensive or to resist a determined thrust at her positions. Austria's subject peoples, seeing freedom as a part of Allied victory, find no reason for longer fighting for the Hohenzollern or Hapsburg crowns.

TURKEY IS TIRED. Wearied of the fight, angered over the settlement of territorial matters between her and Bulgaria and Roumania, Turkey has for several months been a source of anxiety to Berlin. On July 29 London had a report that Turkey has severed diplomatic relations with Germany.

NATION WILL DIRECT LABOR. Beginning August 1 the Federal Employment Bureau will recruit common labor for all plants employing over 100 men. Manufacturers will not be permitted to compete against each other, or to recruit their own ranks from the men employed by another. Non-essential industries will be drawn upon for men needed by essential industries, and no shipping of bodies of men from one state to another will be permitted. No obstacles will be placed in the way of individuals seeking employment.

WORKING OUT THE BIG TAX BILL. While the two houses of Congress indulged in a little recess, the Ways and Means Committee of the House stayed hard at work on the details of the Revenue Bill which is to make every errand dollar in America do its share in the fight. It was reported, on July 25, that the Committee was reluctant to put the excess profits tax on the flat basis of 80% lest the resulting revenue might cripple business, hinder necessary expansion and prevent liberal purchases of Liberty Bonds. The Committee decided to favor a tax beginning at 30% on all net income between 10% and 20% of invested capital, 50% on income in excess of 20% and under 25%, and 80% on income in excess of 25%. It is estimated that this schedule would raise $1,690,000,000 a year, while the flat rate of 80% would raise $2,400,000,000.

CUTTING OUT SWEETS. The Food Administration announced, on July 25, that from August 1 to January 1 the allowance of sugar to households throughout the nation would be reduced to 2 pounds per person per month, the English allowance. France allows 1½ pounds per person per month. House-labor previously exempted was made liable to service. The British Government has, notwithstanding the difficulties in sight, continued with its plans for further dilution of industry with unskilled workers and the drafting of the skilled workers of military age. On July 23 a mass meeting was called in Coventry, of the members of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers and Tool Makers, to vote on the question of a strike. 16,000 workers were affected. On July 24, 65,000 members of twelve societies of munition workers went on strike in Birmingham against the advice of their leaders. On July 25, a conference at Leeds of labor leaders representing 300,000 workers voted to strike and the movement was spreading, although many thousands of workers refused to join the strike and the national labor leaders were working desperately to get the workers back at their tasks. The principal grievance of the strikers appeared to be a government order placing an embargo on rapid changes of employment. The government met the strike with a threat to draft strikers into the army at once and the strike ended.

ARMY MAKES RECORD MEAT PURCHASE. The largest single order for bacon and canned meats in the history of the world—99,560,000 pounds of bacon and 134,000,000 pounds of canned meat—has just been placed by the Quartermaster's Department, U. S. A., for the American Army overseas.

THE FOURTH LIBERTY LOAN. The Treasury Department announced, on July 24, that the campaign for the Fourth Liberty Loan, would cover three weeks, beginning September 28, and closing October 19.

BEATING THE U-BOAT. U-boat sinkings and all marine losses during June totaled 278,629 tons, the lowest for any month since September, 1916. The losses of Allied and neutral shipping from all causes, in the three months ending June 30, were 946,578, the lowest record since the third quarter of 1916. The submarines on July 19th and 20th, however, succeeded in sinking the White Star liner Justicia, 32,120 tons, the largest victim of the torpedo next to the Britannic, sunk early in the war. The Justicia was returning to America after carrying over 5,000 American troops to England. Eleven men of the crew were lost. The submarine operating off the American coast on Monday July 22 sank a Gloucester, Mass., fishing schooner. No lives were lost. Twenty-five U-boats were known to have been sunk from June 15 to July 15.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. Emperor Charles of Austria, on July 22, accepted the resignation of the Austrian cabinet recently organized by von Seidler. Baron von Hussarek, former minister of education, became Premier on July 25, heading a non-partisan cabinet. . . . The Council of National Defense has authorized the wearing, by relatives of a dead soldier, of a mourning band on the left arm which will bear a gold star for each relative lost. Because of the depression so caused, the people are asked to refrain from the wearing of deep mourning, but they are asked to wear the bands more as badges of honor than as expressions of sorrow.

keepers are expected to keep to this allowance as loyally as they did the former one and are asked, in canning, to use those preserving processes which require the least sugar. The reduction in the sugar ration is made necessary by shortage in both cane and beet-sugar crops and by losses of sugar cargoes. Manufacturers' supplies are also reduced. Mr. Hoover announced from London on July 28 that the Allies had passed the food crisis and that we had now only to conserve our crops to insure sufficient food for the coming year with a surplus for the next year's eventualities.

BRITISH LABOR AIDS HUN. Charles H. Gray, writing from London to the New York Times on July 22, predicted trouble in British labor circles as a result of the combining of the industries made necessary by the man-power act and by Great Britain's engagements with her allies. He intimated that if Britain drafted into the armies as many men as the plans contemplated she would both cripple essential industries and sow seeds of discord. British labor had become before the war a little kingdom within the empire and both the Asquith and Lloyd George governments have deferred to the labor leaders. In the discussion of the man-power act, however, Lloyd George made it apparent that he was through trucking to organized labor and found the greatest of her armies, that of the Crown Prince, continuing its inglorious retreat before the victorious Allies in the Marne salient. After two weeks of vigorous fighting, in which it is estimated that Germany had sacrificed upward of 150,000 soldiers on the field and lost over 40,000 prisoners to the Allies, the problem of extricating the Kaiser's badly battered hosts from the dangerous salient was still unsolved. The great German base of supplies at Fere en Tardenois had fallen into the Allies' hands, and French guns dominated the heights east and west of Fismes on the River Vesle, the second Teuton base, threatening to wreck the whole plan of retreat.

The scene of Germany's second defeat on the Marne. Broken line approximate battle line on July 18, shaded area ground regained by General Foch's Allied armies in the fighting from the 18th to the 30th

"BETWEEN the Oureq and the Marne the enemy's resistance has broken down. Our troops with those of our allies are in pursuit."

This message from General Pershing, on July 27, told the story of German defeat and Allied victory. For five days from July 21 to 26 the battle had raged from Soissons to Rheims with a fierceness almost unparalleled in this greatest of wars. The Germans with guns massed to protect their flanks met attack with counter-attack and stood almost unmoved against the Allied pressure from Soissons to the Oureq and from the Marne to Rheims. But from the Oureq to the Marne, although the German reports told daily of Allied repulses the facts were that the repulses were each day nearer to the bases of supplies. The French and American troops, the Americans carrying the most difficult part of this job, kept pushing relentlessly against the doggedly determined enemy. Most of this country is wooded. The woods of Fere and of the Ris Forest were made full use of by the enemy rear guards in delaying the Allies. Machine guns posted in trees, hidden in caverns, masked by brush, took a deadly toll of American and French lives; but the machine gunners paid the price as well, and foot by foot, mile by mile the lines, swaying forward, sagging backward, almost broken now and then by reckless counter-attacks, swept inexorably toward the Oureq and Fere en Tardenois, the nearest of the German bases.

For a time it appeared that the Germans were trying to establish a line from Oulchy le Chateau through Fere en Tardenois to Verneuil on the Marne, but on July 26 the situation cleared and it became apparent that a general retreat had been under way within the salient and that the desperate fighting against the crowding troops of the Allies had been a tremendous rear guard action intended to cover the withdrawal of the guns and material crowded into the salient. All of it did not get away. Nevertheless on the five days when his lines held fairly well the enemy did a very creditable piece of retreating, saving and destroying much of his material and many of his men although working in an inferno of fire from Allied guns and airplanes.

ON July 26 the French took the key point of Oulchy le Chateau on the Oureq. They had been steadily encircling it for three days. They also took Villemonitoire between Oulchy and Soissons. Both of these captures gave them high ground dominating the German base at Fere en Tardenois from which the Americans, fighting forward through the forest of Fere were only three miles distant. British troops had also made an advance of nearly a mile along a four-mile front toward Ville en Tardenois and the French in the Champagne country, east of Rheims, had succeeded in practically restoring the lines to the positions held prior to the 15th. The total of captured soldiers was fast approaching 40,000 and the German situation was extremely critical.

On the 27th it became apparent that a general retreat was on. The Germans gave up their last hold in the north bank of the Marne and also drew in their flanks south of the Oureq. French tanks, French and American cavalry and French and American infantry patrols took up the chase, keeping in touch constantly with the enemy rear-guards and accelerating the retreat from hour to hour. All through July 28 the pursuit continued. Their bridges across the Oureq being destroyed by Allied artillery and airplane bombers, the Germans waded across the shallow stream, but made a definite effort to stand on the north bank.

One of the stiffest struggles took place at the passage of the Oureq river, near Sergy, on Saturday, July 27. The northern bank was held by a strong force of Germans, with hundreds of machine guns hidden away in the rising ground. Our American troops found here the hardest resistance they had yet encountered. They crossed the river several times, only to be driven back by the heavy German fire, but by 10 o'clock they were over to stay. They had seen German snipers hidden with machine guns in trees shooting and killing the American wounded, and the sight made them "see red." After that they swept the hillsides like a tornado.

Here the Germans counter-attacked, throwing three picked divisions of Prussian and Bavarian Guards against the Americans. Sergy changed hands four times, but by noon our boys had captured Sergy, and a number of hours later the village of Sargis also on the northwest bank, and the Huns were in full retreat to a second range of hills.

On both flanks of the battle line the French gained ground on the 29th, and on the 30th they were fighting north of Oulchy for heights which overlooked Fismes some twelve miles away, while southwest of Rheims Allied troops, advancing west of Bligny, were also coming within striking distance of Fismes.

On July 30 the Germans were counter-attacking heavily against the French and Americans from Soissons along the Oureq and eastward to Ville en Tardenois, apparently attempting to restore the Oureq lines.

General Pershing on July 29 had 1,253,000 men in his American Army in France.

From every quarter come stories of the battle qualities of American troops. The Germans no longer say disparaging things about the Army from the west. The Americans using the tactics of Indian scouts, slipped through the woods, surrounding the enemy machine gun nests and taking by stealth posts too strong for direct attack, but direct attack was not beyond their powers, for time after time they swept over sputtering lines of machine guns whose torrent of lead was futile against their grit and their will to win. One American patrol of 21 men that crossed the Marne in the early days of the German retreat got ahead of the objectives and was surrounded. For five days they fought and when other troops relieved them, five of the 21 were still fighting, and the woods around them were full of dead Huns. A French staff officer told an American correspondent, "Your men fought with extraordinary resolution, even in circumstances that appeared hopeless."

One American soldier standing beside the grave of his brother, killed near Chateau Thierry, turned to the Chaplain, his lip held tight between his teeth and said, "That makes six I've got to get, we'd agreed to get three apiece."

Swiss reports say that American prisoners plied with questions by German intelligence officers have made them furious by replying, "Ask Pershing" or "Cable Wilson."

There were many remarkable instances of the skill of the American marksmen, and the way they used their convenient little field cannon—75's—in cleaning out the machine gun nests in thickets, in trees, and even on rocky ground, was wonderful.

Premier Clemenceau visited the battle field and was under fire for several hours during the week. He was in Dormans while German shells were still falling there and saw the pitiful ruin to which the beautiful town had been reduced.

Kaiser William, too, has been near the front, although at a safe distance from the fighting. He has not personally seen how the Americans faced his crack troops like a stone wall and finally drove them back to the north.

The Turn of the Tide

THE stinging repulse of the Germans on the Marne, following so closely upon the Austrian rout in Italy, seems to mark the beginning of the end. It is the opinion of many capable military critics that the Teuton western offensive, now ended in disaster, will be their last, and that from now on they will be on the defensive.

The change in the fortunes of battle, as the result of America's entry into the war, has come sooner than was expected, and the change seems to be more decisive than the most sanguine could have hoped. At America's very first assertion of her power, the illusion of Teuton invincibility is utterly shattered.

In the second battle of the Marne there has been much of the hardest fighting the world has ever known. In every crucial instance of that great contest, the superiority in dash, intrepidity, resistance and even skill, has been credited to the Americans. In their first great battle our boys have given glorious promise of heroic work in the battles to come.

Inspired by our President's high ideals and stimulated by our nation's noble traditions, our boys at the front show courage worthy of their cause. Having something worthy to fight for is half the victory, and President Wilson has given this not only to our own army, but to all the armies of the Allies. A million such fighters as we now have in France make a tremendous contribution of strength; but a more potent contribution still has come to the Allied cause in the high principles and purposes enunciated by our President, which have heartened, quickened and united in common impulse all the forces of democracy of the world.

The price that must be paid for such things as Americans have helped to gain in France is well known and it was counted upon in advance. To the living and the dead in that heroic struggle all of us must give the homage of our cheers and our tears.

Decadent Churches

AT a recent gathering of ministers, one of the speakers sounded a note of alarm, predicting that if the present decline in church attendance in country communities were not checked, we would very soon witness the practical extinction of the rural church throughout a large part of the country. He went further and declared that this decline was due largely to the spiritual indifference of the farmers, who had become worldly-minded with improving material conditions, who loved pleasure more than preaching, and kept a tight hold on their dollars instead of responding to the appeals of the spiritual field. We regard the picture as overdrawn and somewhat unjust to the farmer, besides being an undeserved reflection upon the rural minister. But accepting the statement at its face, and as being well meant and true of at least some churches, the remedy should not be hard to find nor difficult to apply.

We have worshiped in country churches where it was plain to an ordinary observer that the service was sorely lacking in earnestness and Gospel power. The audience sat as if bored; the choir was rusty from want of practice; the sermon was not calculated to interest youth or to keep age awake. We have sat in others where there was a noticeable lack of cordiality such as all wide-awake churches make it a point to extend to strangers. We have listened to sermons that had no application to anything in life today. And we have sat up bravely and forbearingly in others, where the minister preached borrowed sermons—a thing which can hardly escape detection in this day of wide reading. Such preachers underrate the intelligence of their audience, and it is not surprising that audiences should decline.

But we would not convey the impression that all of the fault of slim attendance lies with the pulpit. Much of it does lie there, however, and the first step toward overcoming absentee membership must rest with the minister. If he has a real message, he will soon find a big enough audience. Everybody loves a good, outspoken, Sunday sermon which takes note of what is going on in the great world outside, and from it draws an intelligent spiritual lesson of helpfulness and encouragement. To lose sight of the Gospel, to be deaf to the loud call of missions at home and abroad, to ignore the world-struggle, to fail to urge the great lesson of patriotism and sacrifice at the present time—these are shortcomings that will empty any church.

Further, no pastor today need hope to hold his people if he does not point them to the ways in which Divine Providence is leading this nation to the high task imposed upon it, in accordance with God's purpose for humanity. The new vision of Christ and Christianity which is revitalizing the churches should inspire him also. He should see to it that the faces of his people are turned toward the sunrise. The message he presents must be vital with the spirit of the new age that has just begun, otherwise it will miss its mark. Men and women today are eagerly seeking for Gospel light. They need a pastoral leader who is whole-souled and genuine, and who can guide them in manifold ways of Christian activity and helpfulness, inspiring them by his own example. Every church, however small, will respond to such leadership. A church that has nothing beyond the Sunday sermon and the collection, and possibly a thinly attended weekly prayer meeting, comes perilously near to being inactive and decadent. It needs to be aroused to realize its duties and opportunities. Then it will become a spiritual bee-hive and an industrious factor in all good works. For God blesses the worker and multiplies his number in proportion to the need. It is an exploded theory that one of the principal causes of church apathy is the custom, fortunately not very common, of closing the church during the pastor's midsummer holiday. If the finances do not permit a substitute preacher, some member of the congregation can usually be found who is capable of filling the place temporarily. The pastor is entitled to his holiday in order that he may be continuously efficient. But the church should never abandon its service. The devil never takes a holiday.

Faithful Stewardship

IT is gladdening news to learn in the letter from Jerusalem which we print elsewhere in this issue that the industrial relief work begun there early in the war, with the cooperation of the Christian Herald's readers—and all communication with which was cut off for a long period—has been going on gloriously. During those two years while the city was cut off from the outside world, and Palestine and the contiguous Bible lands were scenes of bloody conflict, and when the hills and valleys round about Jerusalem shook with the thunder of cannon and the noise of contending armies, the work that was founded in love and prayer, and which we feared might be totally extinguished, seems to have been under divine protection. A blessing has rested upon it and it has not even waned, but expanded and accomplished far better things than we could have dared to hope. Major Waters, our representative on the Red Cross Commission, tells the story of its uninterrupted service during those times of trial and suffering. And now, with the city safely in the hands of our Allies, we are assured that the industrial relief work is not only in good hands, but our friends of the American Colony, who have managed it so faithfully and capably since its foundation, are conducting it along the very lines we had planned. It has rendered aid of the most practical kind to large numbers of those rendered destitute by the war, giving them employment, the proceeds from which kept their families from starvation. May a blessing rest upon the noble and generous-hearted men and women of the American Colony for all they have done! They deserve the lasting gratitude of our readers and ourselves for their faithful stewardship.

Government Controls the Wires

THERE will be almost universal satisfaction over the fact that the government has taken possession and assumed control and supervision over every telegraph and telephone system in the United States, from August 1 until the end of the war.

The War and Navy Departments have urged this step as necessary to the prosecution of the war, general business has demanded it as a measure of commercial efficiency and economy, and labor has looked forward to it as an assurance of just wages and fair treatment.

Next to the control of transportation, the control of communication is the most important move toward putting the business of the country on a secure basis. The theory has long existed and had powerful support in this country, and now practical conditions have enforced its application. It is not likely that there will be any regrets. It is hardly likely that there will ever be any return to the old private ownership system.

Postmaster General Burleson, who is made Director of Telegraphs and Telephones, entertains no revolutionary ideas. "It will be the purpose of the Post Office Department," he says, "to broaden the use of the service at the least cost to the people, keeping in mind that a high standard of efficiency must be maintained. I believe that by proper economy and the cutting out of duplications of effort we can effect a great saving to the people. At the same time we can extend the telephone and telegraph to the home of every man in the country. There will be no confusion; the service of the wires will continue and in time will improve."

It is believed by government officials and other experts who have carefully looked into the matter that there will be a profit of from $80,000,000 to $100,000,000 to the government from the operation of the wires, after a fair rental is paid to the owners.

Bezaleels

IT is a prime recommendation for a preacher of the Gospel to be apt in the use of illustration in his discourses. Frequently the truth is driven home with convincing power through an incident dramatically related at the right moment. Moody's sermons were brimful of anecdotes drawn from real life and personal observation. Paul Rader, who now preaches in the Moody Church in Chicago, employs his rare gift of illustration liberally in all his sermons. On a recent Sunday, he was telling his audience of the danger of stubbornness—of a preacher being so set in his own ways that he preferred them to all others, and would not even listen to the suggestion of a change. He told of a minister who came to him and admitted that he could find no way to bring his people up to the point of helping the Lord in giving out the full Gospel in his town. He had tried his best for years, and had come to the conclusion that God wanted the people, but he was not the man to bring them, so he felt he must resign and let some other take his place. Mr. Rader asked him if he had ever thought that God wanted to move him, not out of his old harvest field by detachment, but out of his old ways and methods. Mr. Rader referred him to the story of Bezaleel and the helpers that God gave to Moses, as related in the thirty-first chapter of Exodus. The anxious pastor saw the point and got the vision. "I see that I have tried to do it all alone, even down to the smallest detail," he said, "and haven't trusted God nor looked around for Bezaleels to help. I seemed to have lost sight of the fact that he can put wisdom into the hearts of others to make up for all that I lack. I feel that I have cheated him in not giving them a chance to serve him."

He applied the lesson, and the result was a complete revolution in his church. He enlisted aids at every opportunity—men of prayer and Christian life, who at his call became men of action and cooperation. It was astonishing to find how readily they took up the commissions and carried them through successfully. All they needed was an opportunity to work for the Kingdom, and they put their best in every effort. Soon he began to hear about their success in different places. There was not a single misfit; God had the men ready and all they needed was the call. All thought of resignation vanished from his mind at this new experience. Within a few months he found that the help which had lain ready to his hand had strengthened his church amazingly, increased his own usefulness, broadened the field of service, and revitalized all the work concerning which he had so many heartburnings and misgivings in the past. He had found his Bezaleels.

War's By-Products

THE workings of the war are not all destructive in their after-effects. Some by-products of great value seem assured, permanent additions to the wealth and consequent well-being of the world, aside from the moral and spiritual gains that must come from the ultimate victory. One of the greatest of these will be the creation of new ports, docks and harbor developments made necessary by the needs of the war, but so built as to be of permanent value.

This is suggested by the report that the beautiful harbor of Naples is to be much improved by the extension of docks and a general broadening of its immense natural capacity. More than one French port has been raised from minor usefulness to first-rate importance. Even Bordeaux has profited greatly. And all these immense new utilities will remain as a monument, in part at least, to American engineering efficiency and a liberal use of American money. We shall get full value from them all, and it is pleasant to think that they will also become a lasting benefit to our friends.

Our own home ports, both Atlantic and Pacific, have already felt the stimulus and will continue to grow under it. New York must inevitably be the greatest shipping-point of all the world, without exception, as time goes on. And the enormous new American tonnage now being launched will not go into the scrap-heap when peace comes.

The Church That Made Good

By
B. F. F.

PART II

ANOTHER problem which confronted us in our united church at this time, was that this increase in our membership and the increase in attendance on the services made it imperative that we either enlarge our church building or build a new church which would be adapted to our work. Something had to be done, and done soon. But before we reached any conclusion on the matter, we had still another unexpected increase to our church. There had been two small churches, holding services in school houses in the country, and these decided that it would be to their advantage to unite with us. This, in fact, left us the only church in the township. It also made the question of building most imperative. A meeting of the church directorate was called. They at once decided to build and the church at a meeting ratified this action.

"After careful consideration, plans for the church and parish houses were adopted, and the work of raising money was begun. In a short time money enough to warrant the building had been secured. We decided to take down the building we were in and hold services temporarily in one of the other churches, which had not yet been sold. The building we planned, as you saw it today, was so arranged that it would accommodate all of our church activities then in force, as well as those we might call into life in the future.

"In planning our church work, I decided that, in order to do it most effectively, it should be as far as possible grouped under separate general departments. So I formulated my plans so that the space allotted to the departments would be sufficiently elastic to take in all the various activities in which the church would engage. One of these departments took in the physical training of the young people; another covered our educational work; another the social life, and still another the religious life and activities of our people. Each of these departments was placed as soon as possible in charge of a competent leader. Thus the educational department was in charge of the superintendent of the public schools, who gave his time voluntarily to this work. The physical training department was in charge of the physical trainer of the schools, who devoted much of his time to this work without remuneration. Another department which was added later was the industrial. This department was first in charge of volunteer workers; but later, we secured an employee of the State Bureau of Labor. We were fortunate in getting the services of a man who took a keen interest in our work, and sought in a most intelligent manner to co-operate with our purposes. This feature proved one of the most popular undertakings. It was absolutely free, and the men found that there were no strings attached to its services. If a man was out of work, or needed help or advice of any kind, he could always find what he wanted by seeing the man in charge of the department.

THAT the church can do much in aiding to solve the labor problem we believe most strongly, and that this belief is justified by what we have accomplished along this line no one who will take time to look into the matter will doubt for a moment. In fact, I am convinced that the church has too long neglected her duties in this direction, and the work has largely fallen into the hands of self-seeking, self-interested men, who have only too often exploited labor for their own selfish ends. This class of men led the workmen to believe that the church stands for the man with capital and is not in sympathy with the laboring class. But we found that the average workingman is a reasonable being and open to conviction as well as direction. When the workingmen found that, through our industrial department, we meant to do all that lay in our power to help them to better things, and to aid the worker in securing what rightly belonged to him, they were not only ready to co-operate with us, but to help in every way possible.

"The social department of the church was at first in charge of volunteer workers, but we soon found that to do this work properly, we needed a trained leader. So when the opportunity came to employ a trained social worker, we took it. We were fortunate in engaging a young woman, who had had special training in this kind of work. She took hold of the work in such a manner as to soon make it clear that we had not made a mistake in employing her. She got into the homes as well as the hearts of every woman in the parish. She is still with us, and today there is no one these various departments ample room to carry on their work. The result is the building and the parish houses through which I have just shown you.

"Just let me give you several instances of the results achieved by our industrial department. Ten years ago, there was not a single manufacturing establishment in the town. As I told you before, the industrial department was in charge of a man who was deeply interested in our plans. He was more than a mere secretary who looked after the routine work of his office. He conceived the idea that, with the natural advantages and the excellent shipping facilities the town enjoyed, something should be done to bring some good manufacturing plants to the town; so he called a meeting of the leading men of the church and congregation and put the matter up to them. They for girls were organized, which also proved a very successful feature. To show you what we accomplished, I need but tell you that over one hundred young people prepared themselves in these classes for the entrance examinations of colleges which they entered, and whose courses of instruction they completed with honor. A fine lecture course has also been maintained, and I might say in passing, that it is due to this course that you are here tonight.

"But as I said before, the work that gives us more satisfaction than anything else, is that done in building up our members along the lines of higher and spiritual things. This has been more than merely successful. We aimed to make these various organizations a means to an end, and that end was never lost sight of in our activities. The spiritual life of the church has been deepened, and the vision of the membership enlarged. We see beyond the present and immediate surroundings of our church work. The Kingdom and all that it stands for is very real and vital to our people. The Christian life means more than going to church on Sundays; it means service, and the best Christian man or woman is the one who serves the most willingly.

"There is no distinction in our work for the church. The man of wealth and the laboring man serve on the same committees and enter into the duties of the church in the same enthusiastic manner. They sit side by side at the services, and serve the one great Master with equal zeal. The spirit of Brotherhood is the ruling spirit of the church, and each seeks those things which will enrich and enlarge the experiences of all. In a word, the church is one great Brotherhood in which all are equal, and all are entitled to share in the common blessings which fellowship brings to those who enter into these associations with a willing mind.

THE welcome a stranger receives, as he enters the church on Sunday morning, makes him feel that these men are really glad to see him. This spirit is carried out into our everyday work, and we do not forget the stranger who worshipped with us on Sunday when we meet him during the week.

"Our church activities have become large and varied. We are supporting two mission workers in the foreign field, paying for the education of a number of young men who are preparing themselves for the ministry, and taking care of all of our local expenses without any fuss or trouble.

"As I said when I began this story of our experiences, it hardly seems possible that so much has been accomplished, and that today we have a united church which is doing more effective service than the three churches ever dreamed of doing."

Mr. Williams here paused in his narrative, and sat as if lost in reflection. His companion, too, was silent. In his mind, his own ministerial work was passing in review, and it seemed to him that in comparison with what his fellow worker had accomplished, he had done almost nothing. Finally he roused himself and said:

"You have done a wonderful work here. I almost envy you your success. I will carry back with me the inspiration of this hour, and look forward to greater and better things for myself in my own field."

"You need not be discouraged," Mr. Williams replied. "For you know that to every man is given his work. You in your way, with your talents and ability, the books you have written, and the other things you have accomplished, have been more than once an incentive and inspiration to me, who, like others, stand on the forefront of the battle, and miss the associations of the men who are striving in their way for the same ends and purposes. The important thing, after all, is that every man be faithful in his work."

The National Protestant Church of Geneva to Woodrow Wilson President of the United States of America

Mr. President,

ON the 16th of April, 1918, the Consistoire of the National Protestant Church of Geneva—which dates its origin from Calvin himself—resolved to send you a tribute of admiration for the imperishable thoughts, of the purest Christian inspiration, which are expressed in your messages to the Congress and to the people of the United States.

The Consistoire wishes also to assure you of its gratitude for the invaluable aid you are lending our country in its present economic difficulties.

Switzerland will never forget that, during the critical period of the most terrible of wars, the great sister Republic beyond the Ocean has held out to her a helping hand. The citizens of the oldest democracy in Europe have been profoundly impressed by the eloquent words in which you have set forth the duties of a new humanity and laid down the principles of a Society of Nations, based not on force, but on Justice, Liberty, and Right. They will ever remember that you have proclaimed that the guarantees exchanged at the conclusion of peace must neither recognize nor imply a difference between big nations and small, between those that are powerful and those that are weak.

It is the first time in history that the Chief Magistrate of a country, which counts more than a hundred million inhabitants, declares to the whole universe that armies and navies must be a power for order merely, not an instrument of aggression or of selfish violence. The Protestants of Geneva feel a legitimate pride in recognizing in you a spiritual son of the Calvinistic Reformation of the 16th century. They are happy to find in your messages the principles with which the Puritans of England and Scotland and the Pilgrim Fathers were imbued.

We write this letter in the very building in which the great Scotch reformer, John Knox, preached the Gospel from 1556 to 1559, to his fellow-countrymen, exiled from their native land for their religious convictions.

We address to God Almighty a fervent prayer for the realization of your high ideals which would establish the reign of Peace on earth and good will towards men. For the Consistoire of the National Protestant Church of Geneva,

The President, Auguste Lemaitre
The Vice-President, David DeLetra, Pasteur,
The Secretary, Rene Vernet.

connected with the activities of the church who is more highly esteemed than this woman. The mothers, who in the hours of their troubles come to her for advice and comfort, find her more than a friend to them. Especially have the younger women and girls learned that she is, next to their mother, the best friend they have. Many a young girl's feet have been kept from slipping by her wise counsel and direction. They all trust her implicitly.

"Our social department is wide-reaching in its results. The directress takes time every day to get into the homes of the people. Rich or poor, high or low, all are alike to her in her work of ministration. Many homes have been changed by her coming into them, and by kindly advice or carefully dropped suggestions, changes in the home life have been made which resulted in making them happier and more contented. Often she gives her assistance to the tired wife and mother by caring for a fretful child, while the mother takes a nap, or goes for a much needed airing. I could tell you of instances where this wise woman has by her work kept homes together which were on the verge of breaking up and going to pieces. The department has been one of the most helpful and inspiring of all.

"Now, to return to the matter of building our church home. We had to take care of these departments, as I said, so, in planning the church home, we arranged it with a view to giving formed an auxiliary organization, the purpose of which was to investigate local conditions with the view of inviting manufacturing plants to locate here. The local newspapers were interested in the matter and gladly co-operated. As a result, one after another factory was located here, until today we have a dozen or more of the best plants in the country.

ANOTHER instance might be cited. Some differences arose in one of these plants between the manager and his employees. For a time it looked as if the differences might become serious. The director of the industrial department offered to act as mediator between the parties concerned. Both sides readily agreed to this, as they had unflinching confidence in his ability, his integrity and his fairness to judge in the matter in dispute. They submitted their case to him, and when he decided it, both sides promptly accepted the decision and came together on the terms of settlement he proposed.

"What has been said of these departments is equally true of the work done by the educational department. Under the direction of the school superintendent and his assistants, this department has done remarkable things. Classes in English, in book-keeping, stenography, business ethics, and other subjects were organized, and the young people took to them eagerly and promptly. Classes in domestic science

MOVING TO DESTINY

A SERMON

By
REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

TEXT—Gen. 12:1. "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto the land that I will show thee."

AND the Lord said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country." But that was by no means the first step in Abram's appointed destiny. There was a prior movement, unconscious but inspired. The first steps toward Canaan had been taken by Abram's father in Abram's childhood. "And Terah took Abram . . . and went forth . . . to go into the land of Canaan, and they came unto Haran."

There is nothing in these words about divine guidance, nothing about any direct speech to Terah. It was a dumb leading. It was almost an ordinary, commonplace removal, with no apparent divinity in it. Yet it marks the first steps towards Canaan, and it initiates the elementary stages of Abram's destiny.

The Lord is busy with His preparatives long before His purpose emerges clearly in our consciousness. The clear speech is usually culminative, not originitive. The spoken call often marks the moment of the crisis, but God has been gradually leading up to it. There have been three miles of a dead-level road leading to our Mont Blanc! We have been passing through commonplace and apparently insignificant events when all the time the Lord has been busy tracing out the early steps of a great vocation.

Henry Martyn went to Cambridge, and there was no conscious divine call in the going. But afterward he could see how the unconscious leadership had been of God, and how it had been in direct preparation of his after ministry. He became an expert in the handling of languages, and was all the time fitting himself for the unknown destiny. It was the same with George Pilkington in the little dairy farm in Ireland. He seemed to be moving in the commonplace track of a small circle, when all the time he was taking the first steps along a road that led to his marvellous work in Uganda. We do not realize the meaning of these first steps towards our destined Canaan. We are building better than we know! How frequently we say one to another, in the light of after days, "I little thought that when I was doing so-and-so I was preparing for so-and-so!" When the call comes to move out from our country we can see why we were led as far as Haran.

BUT now the divine call emerges into the clear consciousness of Abram's life. "The Lord said unto Abram!" How did the Lord say it? Never let us assume the extraordinary when the ordinary will suffice. It is always best to begin the interpretation of the Scriptures on the plan of the common consciousness. Never postulate a miracle if the incident can be explained without it. It may be that common experience will afford no key to the problem; but let us try it before we assume a special intervention.

We have too frequently dehumanized the men and the women of the Old Testament because, with very reverent purpose, we have removed them so far from the common track. But they were men and women of flesh and blood, with passions like our own, with discernments like our own, and with the same fundamental instincts, to which our God could make appeal. "He hath fashioned their hearts alike." Let us therefore use our own key to every lock, and see if we can find the explanation of another man's life within the bounds of our own experience.

How, then, did the Lord speak unto Abram? How does He speak to you and me? We use all manner of vague phrases to express our sense of the divine leading. Here is a little batch of them: "I had a feeling!" "I could not get away from it!" "I could not get it out of my mind!" "I felt I must!" There is nothing very definite and illuminating about this speech, and yet it all suggests the compulsion of a divine imperative.

We can talk to men without the ministry of actual speech. If I come upon a blind man at a street corner who wishes to cross the street, I do not guide him with counsel, I speak to him with a grip! I lay my hand upon his shoulder and speak to him in the language of dumb constraint. Is not this the meaning of that great phrase in the book of Isaiah, "The Lord said unto me with a strong hand"? Isaiah felt the dumb grip of the Almighty, and he felt he must! It may be that some similar imperative laid hold of the soul of Abram, and he felt he had got to leave the homeland. Or sometimes the divine will is made known to us in some new and strange assortment of our circumstances; an unexpected door opens, and every other door seems to close, and there is only one way before us.

"GET thee out of thy country!" Very little information was given. Canaan was not even mentioned. "Unto the land that I will show thee." Abram had no knowledge of the ultimate goal, but he was perfectly sure of the present direction. Where the road would lead after the next turning he could not tell; but this much was clear, "it is along here!" "The distant scene" was still in the mist. But what of that? The immediate direction was plain, "one step" was enough!

And so it is with the divine guidance today. The Lord does not light up the entire road leading from the calling to the goal. He just lights up the bit of the road we have got to travel today, and the rest is still in darkness. He takes us partly into His counsel. "Now I know in part." That lamp is lit of which we have present need. "Abram went out not knowing whither he went." "We walk by faith and not by sight."

And so everything depends upon what we do with the lamp that is shining. If we are faithful to its guidance it will lead us to the next light, and so on, and so on, till we reach the appointed end.

Lead, kindly Light, amid the encircling gloom.
Lead Thou me on.
The night is dark, and I am far from home.
Lead Thou me on.
Keep thou my feet, I do not ask to see
The distant scene: one step enough for me.

NOW, let us mark the sacrifices which are implied in obedience. Let us read our own heart into the record. "Get thee out of thy country!" He must leave his fatherland. Do we realize what that means for many a young missionary and for many a young colonist, when he feels the God-compulsion that drives him from his native shores? "And from thy kindred!" He must leave the race with whom he has the most affinities, and with whom there exists the ripest responsiveness and understanding. "And from thy father's house." He must leave his home!

There are many among my congregation who can enter into the pang of that severance; young men and women who have but recently pulled up the roots from the old home, and the plant of their life has not yet recovered from the shock. And obedience meant all this to Abram. God's calling always implies sacrifices. We cannot tell how they may come. But companionship with the Lord always means the carrying of the cross.

Sometimes the cross-bearing is not found in stepping out towards Canaan, but in remaining at home. There are many young people who have a great craving to go to the foreign field, but the craving has to be crucified, for the immediate and clamant duty is at home. Their sacrifice consists in abiding. But whatever may be the nature of the call, in some way or other, it will involve the shedding of blood. And we can be healthily suspicious of ourselves if in the line of our life no demand arises for the bearing of the yoke.

BUT what was to be the motive power in this obedience? What is offered to this willing pilgrim? First of all he was offered guidance. "Unto a land that I will show thee." Glorious is the promise! Across the way of the unknown he should have the guiding and illuminating presence of the Eternal. "O'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent, till night is gone!" He was never to be left alone, never to be a child of the night; the lamp was to be always shining, and was to make the night even as day round about his feet.

And, secondly, he was offered guardianship. "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee." The blessings were to be enriched, and the curse by being cursed was to be negated! All of which just means that the manifold circumstances of the changing way were all to be propitious to this pilgrim of the Eternal. Nothing was to do him any harm. Blessings were to fall upon him enriched by the divine touch, curses were to fall harmlessly, cursed out of their destructiveness. "Who shall harm you if ye be followers of that which is good?"

And, lastly, he was offered prosperity. "I will make of thee a great nation." His life was to make for continual enlargement. That is a line of the divine purpose. It ever makes the fuller and richer life. Such were the motive promises in the calling. And the essence of the promise belongs to all people in all time. The guise of the fulfillment may vary, but its heart abides.

If we go out at the Lord's bidding we can be perfectly sure of His guidance, and with absolute certainty we shall get across the moor; and we may be perfectly sure of His guardianship; He will abstract the poisonous sting from every hurtful circumstance. And whatever may be our lot when judged by the standards of the world, our life will march to ever more abundant riches in Christ Jesus.

"So Abram departed as the Lord had spoken to him." May we too offer a similar obedience whenever the call comes sounding into our souls!

Our Voice After Death

SUNDAY, August 11. Heb. 11:4. "He being dead yet speaketh." We go on speaking after we are dead. That is a very solemn thought. What will be the character of the voice with which we shall speak? What will our life continue to say in the lives and remembrances of others? The continuing voice has sometimes been described as the echo of the life and shares its character. But it is far other than that. An echo is only a weak and weakening continuance of the original voice, and it speedily passes into unobserved and unregistered silence. But death does not change life's voice into a fading echo. The life itself persists, vital and positive, radiating quickening or deadening influence. Death does not change character, and character never loses its contagion. We live on, and after death the influence of our life is what it was before.

If, therefore, we would know with what kind of voice we shall continue to speak after death, we need only consider the character of our life. I do not mean our reputation. Reputation is like an outer garment which we can frequently change: it may be changed a dozen times in the course of seventy years. But character is an inner garment, whose texture is woven by thought, and feeling, and desire, and action: and this garment is not exposed to the fickle whims of men, or the caprice of circumstance. Happy the man who is clothed in the robe of righteousness and the garment of salvation! It is that inner self, our very self, with its own abiding purpose and devotion, which determines what happens in the way of continuance when death removes us from our visible place among the children of men. "He, being dead, yet speaketh!"

All this is very solemn. And it would be overwhelming if we knew no way by which our lives may be made pure and harmonious, and, even now, able to radiate influences which will help to sweeten and inspire our fellow men. But the secret has been unveiled to us, and we know the way. Our Saviour had his own wonderful figure of speech which no one else could employ. "The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." And from that in-filling there results an overflowing. From that well there flows a river. "Out of him shall flow rivers of water," irrigating and fertilizing the lives of others. Death does not dry up that living well, and therefore death does not dry up the river. The river from the living well in the soul of Dorcas goes on flowing! And so with the river of John, and of Paul! And so will it be with thy river and mine!

The Glory of Cana

MONDAY, August 12. John 2:11. "This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested forth his glory." Jesus was no recluse. He was fond of human society. There was a family festival at Cana. It was a time of inerrymaking. Jesus was invited. The family may have been relatives of his. He and his mother were there. His presence robbed the occasion of nothing of its gladness. Rather, he added to it. He manifested the glory of a companionable soul. Think what this means. The Son, who is the express image of the Father, proves that "the heart of the Eternal is most wonderfully kind." Moreover, he manifested the glory of a gracious and ministering friend. These happy folks were in trouble. Jesus' time to work miracles has not yet come, but he consents to anticipate the moment of the revealing of his power. So doing, he manifests the glory of a perfectly unselfish spirit. How often we seek his miraculous intervention in natural processes for our own purely personal purposes! We even dare to ask spiritual gifts that we may use them to our advantage. In doing so, we add to our prayers, "for Jesus' sake," when if we were candid, we should confess we are asking for our own sakes!

The marriage miracle manifested the glory of super-human power. "The conscious water saw its God and blushed." Marvelous miracle was this, and yet it was but the accelerated process which the God of Nature repeats in every vineyard, and in every wheat field of the earth. Have we forgotten that the Christ of Cana is the Lord of Nature? Yet after all, the best test of power is power over human life. Christ had that, and has it still.

The Spirit of Truth

TUESDAY, August 13. John 15:26, 27. "When the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me: and ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning." The testimony of the disciples of Jesus is here connected with the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon them, and it is stated that as a result of the indwelling of the Spirit in them, they will begin to bear witness in behalf of their Lord and his word. The confession of Christians before the world in behalf of the truths of Scripture and their Redeemer is to be regarded as an effect of their regeneration and an act of faith. From an unconverted person no testimony for Christ can be expected. In his natural state he does not appreciate the word of God. He does not bestow any attention upon it himself, nor is he pleased when he is brought under its influence by others. But after he has become converted through repentance and faith, and the Spirit of Christ is in him, his mind undergoes a change. What he abhorred before now becomes a blessed occupation to him. What he had hated and ridiculed before in others he now loves and praises himself. This surprising change must be acknowledged to be an effect of the operation of the Spirit in him. The Spirit is a Spirit of truth, and his aim is to lay bare to the individual Christian's inspection every falsehood and every half-truth in matters spiritual. Moreover, since this Spirit is never idle, he urges the Christian to bear witness to his fellow men of all that he has come to regard as divine truth, to oppose every deception in matters of faith and Christian conduct, and to rouse the consciences of others to the end that they may also give honor to the truth. True, when speaking of the priceless value of that faith which has found the saving truth, Scripture compares it to a precious pearl, that is jealously guarded by its possessor in the shrine of his heart. But when speaking of the power of faith Scripture compares it to a beacon light that sends its rays in all directions through the darkness of this world.

The Holiness of Love

WEDNESDAY, August 14. John 15:12. "Love one another as I have loved you." Is not love the greatest impelling power in God's world? We must love to live, in the highest sense. One desires to live tomorrow and all the tomorrows because of those he loves. If alone, he would pray to die. Therefore, love God, your neighbor, your friends, your family, your country, the church and the truth. The more love we give away the more we possess. "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth." The reflex, ebbing tide is always flowing back into your bosom. The exercise of love is its strength.

Love never flourishes in an atmosphere of envy, evil speaking, hatred, revenge and jealousies. Such a spirit hardens the arteries of the soul, obstructing the flow from the heart of love.

Our Lord has given the measure for love—"as I have loved you." We know that his love never fails; his promises are sure; his presence perpetual, his pattern perfect. Having loved his own, he loved them unto the end. It is well to study the little kind deeds our Lord was ever doing, as well as his great, miraculous works. Think of his visiting the sick, feeding the hungry, comforting the troubled and fondling the children. Our love, to be like his, should manifest itself in a thousand little kindnesses that flow forth as spontaneous as breathing. Love deals in eternal things, like faith and hope, joy and peace. It is the spring whence all the waters of virtue flow. It is a forever faculty. Love marries the heart of man in everlasting union with him who is called the God of love. Side by side we walk with him and with his followers, helping to draw all men unto him by the magnet of love. Love is the fulfilling of the law, the glory of the judgment throne, the light of life eternal. The holiness of love will be followed by the happiness of God's infinite family throughout all the cycles of eternity.

The Path Unknown

THURSDAY, August 15. Isa. 42:16. "I will lead them in paths that they have not known." To whom were these words spoken? To God's servants who had forsaken and forgotten Him, but who had returned and were penitent. The promise is similar to that in the Epistle to the Romans: "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the children of God." So the benefit of the promise is limited, conditional. The universe is governed according to law. It is not otherwise in religion. Two great laws govern the life of faith, human agency and divine potency. We need guides, because of our weakness and our ignorance and because of the perils of the way. Our greatest peril is the possible loss of faith. Men are eagerly inquiring, "Is the universe friendly?" Another peril to our souls is the possible loss of enthusiasm. Wise was that French philosopher who, speaking to young people, said, "Cherish well your enthusiasms, for life robs us of so many we are likely to reach the end of the race without them." Wise too that English philosopher who gives us this saying: "No heart is pure until it is passionate; no virtue is safe unless it is enthusiastic."

What can save us from loss of faith and loss of fervency? The very thing which God promises in these words, infallible guidance in the ways of life. "Thou wilt show me the path of life." Over-confidence is characteristic of youth. Under-confidence is characteristic of the disillusioned soul. Rational confidence, spiritual boldness, wealth of motive, plentitude of power, undiminished and undiminishing hope—these are the heritage of all who consent to be led along unknown paths by Infinite Wisdom.

The Free Word of God

FRIDAY, August 16. II Tim. 2:9. "The word of God is not bound." Paul had suffered imprisonment for preaching the word. In a manner, then, the word was bound. What the apostle means to say is, that he will gladly suffer hardship, if only the word of God be given free course. The enemies of the Church, in order to check her growth, have in all ages sought to deprive her of the privilege of free speech, or to make the exercise of that privilege difficult. Ahab charged Elijah with disturbing Israel by his preaching, and finally compelled him to leave the country. Amos was enjoined from preaching at Bethel. Jeremiah was cast into a cistern to stop him from reproving the iniquities of his countrymen. The Jewish priests straitly forbade the apostles to mention the name of Jesus any more at Jerusalem. Similar attempts to gag the preachers of God's word have been made in later centuries. How highly, then, should we esteem the glorious privilege vouchsafed the inhabitants of this free country, the liberty of speech! Every American citizen may proclaim his political as well as his religious convictions without let or hindrance, provided only he does not come in conflict with the existing system of public order and disturb the peace of the land. The inestimable value to the Christian Church of this privilege cannot be too highly extolled, nor can Christians thank the Lord sufficiently for it, or cease to pray for its continuance. For this privilege of free speech secures to the Church the unhindered use of the means for its propagation, the public profession of the truths of Holy Scripture. In this public profession lies the vital strength of the Church. Wherever the Church has been given free scope to proclaim the salvation of the world by Jesus Christ she has grown from a little mustard seed into a tree that overshadows the whole land and affords spiritual refreshing and protection to millions of men. God has richly blessed the exercise of this privilege for the upbuilding of his kingdom.

Doubt and Trust

SATURDAY, August 17. John 20:28. "My Lord and my God!" Unbelief is unwillingness to trust in God. Doubting is a cloud over the soul, longing to see the light. The two are as wide apart as the poles. Thomas was a doubter, thirsting for the truth about the resurrection of Jesus. Judas was an unbeliever who loved wealth and worldliness instead of Christ and holiness. The one hanged himself; the other cried out for joy, "My Lord and my God!" Has not every great believer been an honest doubter? Is it any more wrong to doubt when searching for the truth than to have temptations? Are not both elements of the fiery trials which tend toward the perfection of virtue, the glory of the crown of life and the final victory of the soul?

Blessed are they who have had visions of the Christ, finally dispelling all doubts, and more blessed they who can believe without seeing the physical form. But our Lord is willing to give the troubled ones the evidence of his precious presence. We can remember the hour when we were risen with Christ and felt his individual personality by our side, walking with us all the way.

When it is the vast question of Jesus and his resurrection, one should not be blamed for wishing to be sure. When he becomes our light, the bats of doubt are banished by its effulgence. Thomas feared the resurrection of Jesus was too good to be true. When he beheld him, he was ready to die for him.

It is said that Horace Bushnell, while in Yale College, stood in the way of many young men during a great revival of religion. He was a great doubter. At last he said, "I am sure it is better to be good than bad, virtuous than vicious. I will then be obedient to the light I have." The more he came to know Christ, the more light he had, until Bushnell became the greatest minister in New England.

The Man Who Lost God

By
ELIZABETH BURGESS HUGHES

AD CANLER, celebrated preacher, inimitable evangelist and steady, if somewhat spectacular, sayer of souls—a man as fearless as he was sincere—had been shot down as he was leaving his church.

The thrill of amaze and shock that swept through the country, emblazoning itself in staring headlines and endless gossip and discussion, succeeded in throwing up to view vividly, as years of prayerful toil could not have done, the man's unselfish passion for souls, his unceasing labor, his arm-and-hammer fervor, his scorn of subterfuge or compromise. He had been intensely in earnest, with that virile absorption and faith in his subject which blots out tact, patience, sometimes even consideration. He believed in attacking evil single-handed, with no beating about the bush, and sweeping it root and branch from the places of its dominion. It was this unsparing and whole-souled refusal to compromise in the slightest degree with his enemy, the devil, that led to his death.

A revival had been going on, and the chief source of the town's iniquity and general moral wobblyness, Jim Harrell, political "boss" and whiskey dealer, had set himself to the task of rendering the minister's daily and nightly exhortations as ineffective as possible. Here was a man, he found, who dealt blow for blow, who fought in the open. A foe worthy of one's steel always attracts. Canler was interfering with his affairs—or so he chose to regard the minister's plea for a clean government and his denunciation of the town's chief shortcomings, behind which, looming large, stood Harrell. The minister was open in his denunciations; Harrell was open in his enmity and characteristic determination not to be outdone. But when Harrell saw even the submerged tenth to whom he had hitherto represented authority swerving in company with the "best people," in the minister's direction, his fury flared up like a great flame. It gathered force until one night as Canler came down the church steps, Harrell faced him on the pavement and shot him dead.

CANLER had a young son, Paul, whose intention since childhood had been to take up his father's work. At the time of the tragedy he was only twenty, but his father was his idol and anything that paragon chose to do or be represented right and truth to the boy. The accident of the older man's death made an infidel of him. At least if not that, he was no longer able to lift his eyes with the "Lord, Lord" of faith. Men pointed him out as a striking example of retroversion; to himself he was simply a man who had believed in God and had lost that belief.

"It was the injustice of the thing," he said to the only friend to whom he ever spoke of the affair—"the injustice! There was father working himself to a shadow for the cause he loved, giving himself, body and soul, to his God, then that God—his—permits him to be slaughtered like an animal! I saw him there, wallowing in a pool of his own blood—he who would gladly have given every drop of it for the Christianity he served. But not like that!—I tell you, faith doesn't survive such things. It was rank, brutal injustice—"

"Hush!" gently said the friend, who perceived that he was afar off but believed he would come back after his period of rebellion. "You're trying now to understand God, to give him pointers on what he should and should not do. When did ever man do that?"

"Oh, I won't talk about it—I hate argument," burst out young Canler in a frenzy of distaste. "But I tell you your platitudes, your hopeless orthodoxy sicken me. Let me alone. Until I can forget father dying there in the street, in the fulness of his power and belief, I don't want to hear of your God."

"My God!" said the friend, helplessly.

But Canler shrugged and would not answer. He went his way—and he did not come back. For him, apparently, that chapter of his life had closed. He went no more to church, or among those who had known and loved his father. He had seemingly forgotten that he had meant to preach, to take the other's place in the world. He went into business, and grew hard and silent and cold. Worldly matters appeared to absorb him completely. After a while the tragedy of his father's death slipped from men's minds, and there was no reason to suppose that Paul vitally remembered. But scarcely a day went by that that swift, shocking scene did not pass in review before him. The wound bled out of sight. He could not kneel and pray to the God who had so bereaved him; he could not carry on the labors of a man who had been so repaid by the Deity. Not even the knowledge of others' sufferings, and of Golgotha, carried any comforting analogy. His father had meant more to him than other men's fathers meant to them—he was quite sure of that. And the manner of his going was unforgivable.

The years passed, and Canler was thirty-four—quiet, self-possessed, matter-of-fact, older than his years, to all appearances invulnerable, but wincing often in his loneliness and rawness of soul, upon which men sometimes laid blundering fingers. He felt his own lack, but in his stubbornness refused to acknowledge its source. Men were better off without a God who could so calmly break human ties, tear out human heart-strings and leave human lives in débris. But the going of his faith had left a tremendous gap, a beating wound. It had never healed—as he saw it, would never heal.

IT was Christmas eve. Snow had begun to fall earlier in the day, and now, as the lemon-colored street lamps glowed one by one out of the drifting and foggy gloom, the snow settled into a steady downfall. Tomorrow, in good faith, would be a white Christmas, thought Paul Canler, as he shut down his desk and reached for the soft hat on the peg above him. As he was getting into his greatcoat the thought

Drifting

THE sun has set behind the mist-crowned hill;
The world has sunk to rest; the winds are still.
And now we two, between the gold and gray,
Set out to find our magic Yesterday.
Only a little night breeze brings a faint,
Sweet breath of bursting blossoms, and the plaint
Of some small drowsy bird. We float away
Among the mirrored shallows, where the play
Of noiseless ripples, following in our wake,
Spreads slow upon the silver-surfaced lake.
The slender sickle of the moon hangs high,
A fairy promise in the purple sky.
Dim, lily-padded pools that lie before,
And coves that curve the shadow-shrouded shore.
Allure. The rushes nod along the banks,
Slim-shafted sentinels in rustling ranks. . . .
Your breath, a little quickened, fans my cheek;
Your hand is warm in mine. You do not speak. . . .
We only drift, we two, in our frail bark,
Drift silently, between the gray and dark.
There may be ugly rocks among the sedge,
Or jagged thorns that thrust along the edge
Of placid pools, where that soft, fragrant breeze
Kisses the water, thrills the drooping trees.
There may be unknown dangers everywhere
About us; yet we neither know nor care.
We only want to find along our way
New traces of love's magic Yesterday.

LILLIAN BENNET THOMPSON.

struck him that that other Christmas—the last of his happy youth—was white, too. He remembered watching the big flakes come steadily down upon the great shoulders of his father as he trudged up the path from the trolley station, waving his hand, with the bright warm smile no one ever forgot, in greeting to the face at the window. And he, Paul, had laughed and hurried out to him, to receive a cheering report of good work done. "Heaven grant next year will go as finely!"

Well—it hadn't. Next year had found only the quiet grave, with winter snows and summer suns, spring rains and autumn's haze of gold upon it. And tonight, off yonder, the snow was falling gently upon the mound underneath which lay the heart that had overflowed with passion for good, had known only one desire—to further the Kingdom of Heaven.

He went out into the night, now entrancingly like a fairyland under the lighted, falling flakes. His heart was bitter. Tonight, of all nights, he seemed to walk alone. No subtle philosophy, no promise of the future guided him. Life was material, and the material failed one. It could not feed the spirit—that part of one that called and ached and cried. . . .

He walked unseeing past a lighted mission—one of the sort established for the wanderer, the outcast, the down-and-outer. His fastidious soul recoiled from their noisy demonstrative services. Men of intellect, of refinement, of understanding could not be appealed to in this way. Yet he stopped still in the snow and listened. They were singing. The swaying voices held the crude challenge of emotion and the absolute sincerity that is arresting anywhere. Unconsciously Paul, in his loneliness and yearning, was drawn nearer.

Some one was playing a flute—a wheezy untechnical performance; and presently a man's voice soared high above the rest—a wonderful voice, crude like the others but warm, big, vital and vibrant with feeling.

Canler liked that voice. Instinctively he felt that here was a real presence, a shining human personality that stood triumphant and unscathed against whatsoever odds. He thought of his father. His had been such a personality until—

He turned away, drearily, as that leaping voice broke from the confines of the stuffy mission and poured out trumpet-like into the snow-garlanded night.

SUDDENLY Canler whirled back upon his own tracks and went up to the door of the mission. It was open. He glanced inside. A crowd surged up to the very entrance. A wave of enthusiasm was running along its ranks. Rough, gnarled faces, an atmosphere of tobacco and general staleness and unventilation could not deaden that invisible thrill of feeling. Still held by impulse, Canler pushed his way inside, among the "great unwashed" with a half-smile at his own whim. It had been years since he had entered any kind of church, heard any kind of sermon. Had this been a decorous and silent place, probably it would have made no appeal to him. He was lonely; he needed companionship, not the over-trained and over-refined comradeship of his kind, but unpolished, elemental contact with the untrained, almost Adamic simplicity of soul which these men and women betrayed. Then, too, that surging voice had called him—called as if it had spoken his name.

Some one shoved past him, offering him a seat. He took it, with a mumbled word of thanks, his eyes fastened on the platform. A big man with a heavy beard and thick, very gray hair was singing, high above the others. This, then, was the owner of the Voice.

After a moment the song ended, and the big man began to speak. He was as crude as his surroundings promised, and as powerful. At his first words Canler leaned forward, interested. As the speaker went on, his eyes lighted and glowed in comprehension. The other's ringing tones beat like blows of iron upon his heart. Gradually they thrust aside its defenses and flimsy shields. He sank back, struggling with himself, feeling a surge of anger against the rough power that could thus force its way through his little crust of cynicism and rebellion. He shrugged and looked at the faces about him—coarse, open-mouthed but luminous with understanding. What strange power did the man on the platform possess? Why, here was another Jerry McAuley, lifting high his great white banner of appeal that stained, despairing souls might see and follow—here another Moody, unpolished of speech, over-eager of manner, lighted with the divine fire from within which no man could witness unmoved. "Who is he?" he found himself asking of the man next him.

"Dunno. Stranger here—come just last night, I think. Some speaker, ain't he?" and they fell together into utter absorption of the big man's words.

"Oh, God has been good!" the man on the platform said, in a breaking voice. "Unto me who am the least" he has given his peace which passeth understanding. Like Paul, I have had a vision. Like Paul, I persecuted the Christians and their God. But he showed me my work in the world—through one I persecuted. Nay, more than persecuted—robbed of his life, shot down as one shoots down a dog—my fellowman, God's good man. . . . His worker."

A baby began to cry and the mother, soothing it audibly, tried to make her way through the crowd. It surged open for her and the momentary parting hid the speaker and pushed Canler against two men talking together in eager undertones.

"Discharged convict . . . shot a man once . . . got religion in jail—said to have converted more men than any free preacher in the States. . . ."

THEN the crowd closed up and the big man's face, illuminated by the passion of yearning and entreaty, looked down upon his listeners. Canler felt a very shock seize him, hold him. Of course—why hadn't he seen before? To be sure, the gray hair and beard were disguising, and he had never heard Jim Harrell sing, but intuition, the very forces of mental and moral antipathy should have told him that here was his enemy—the crude instrument Fate had used to cut off that splendid, illustrious career he had meant to follow, step by step. He drew back, shaken with a quiet nervous chilling. The tragedy of years before flared up like a moving picture on a screen—he saw his father lying helpless on the wintry sidewalk, blood oozing from a wound in his breast. . . .

He made a feeble movement to get out of the place, but the crowd held him; just then he had not the strength to push his way out. He sank back, trembling. The breaking voice went on:

"They sent me to prison. I rebelled, cursing all mankind. Then, after a time, I saw the folly of it all. Gradually the spell of his kindness and courage took hold of me. I could think of nothing else. It was an obsession. I had hated him. He had hated, not me, but my sins. I began to distinguish between the two attitudes. I could have sworn he had forgiven me while he lay there in the snow, dying. He had looked up at me—Oh, my friends, one never forgets when he has come into close contact with a soul infinitely bigger than himself! I saw how little harm I'd done him—I had hurt only myself.

"I didn't see all this at once, but slowly and with endless difficulty. And I would have given my life to have had him know just how I felt about it. Because I couldn't tell him I told God, and God . . . listened. In my prison cell I found the other man's Master—I felt that I could put out my hands and touch Him. Then I went to work for Him. I worked hard, though I was behind bars. I influenced those around me, and strove hard to bring that great brooding Presence ever closer. They called me the 'Convict Preacher.' Some laughed, but most of them saw that I was in bitter earnest. After awhile men began to draw closer—to make of me a sort of father confessor.

"I went on working, trying to make others see the light that had come to me. Finally my term was up, and they set me free—free to go out into God's sunlight, thrilling with knowledge of the big world and the toil before me. It wasn't easy. Men were apt to sneer when they learned who I was, and to say all manner of evil against me. I had deserved it, I knew that. Only my money, friends and good behavior had made my term short—given me my life, in fact, and there was naturally prejudice to contend with—and memory. But I only prayed and worked the harder. After a time the struggle grew less terrible. My work prospered. The stain of Cain became fainter in the absolute conviction that my service was acceptable in His sight.

"So, tonight, you see in me a man torn with suffering, agonized with repentance, yet a fighter, every inch of him, for the God he once villified. I shall fight till I die—fight for the lives the other man fought for; and I have perhaps aided those he couldn't have come in contact with. My work is lowly, but every soul is precious in His sight. May He forgive me the evil I have wrought!" the big voice faltered brokenly as if drenched with the soft violence of tears,—"the evil I have wrought! May the tears of blood of my repentance wipe out the memory."

HIS head fell forward to his hands; shaken with sobs, he stood before them.

A more highly attuned, cultured audience would no doubt have accused him of "playing to the gallery," but these enthralled, simple hearted men and women saw only the quick wrenching agony and the broken appeal. He was one with them, and they understood. Few could have doubted when that distorted face of ecstasy and suffering was lifted, glorified by the rack of pain and the yearning for atonement.

And Canler saw. The bitter years of doubt slipped from him like a loosened cloak. Old hopes, old voices, old dreams swarmed into his melting heart. Out of evil comes forth good! Darkness merges into light! It is the law of our inexplicable experiences. He understood vaguely that his father's work did not stop with his death—understood, too, that perhaps God's will lay back of the whole, and that "Ad" Canler's going meant more, by very force of its manner, than years of living. A great cause held back only gathers force meanwhile. Ah, yes, did not God know what he was about? It was all vague, to be sure, yet now, in his mind, strangely certain. Some big, infinite force seized, held him. His heart sang. The locust-eaten years dimmed in the vivid revelation of tonight. . . . Light was beating in on his darkened soul. . . .

He worked his way through the crowd till he stood just below the platform. The big man looked down at him. An electric shock seemed to pass between the two, settling about the heart of each. Jim Harrell stood quite still, and waited. If he thought this the hour of revenge he met it quietly.

But the incredible happened. Paul's hand went out.

"Forgiveness is nearer God's way than revenge," he said simply. "We will work together, you and I—his work. I have wasted the years, but you, my friend, have carried on. You must show me how to begin again."

Harrell's hard fervent fingers closed on his. His features were twisted with emotion.

"God is good to me!" said the big, vibrant voice brokenly.

Paul Canler knew that the God he had lost was found.

God's Smile

A READER of the Christian Herald, Mrs. O. F. McClure, sends in the story of a pleasant little incident that I am going to quote to you. She has called it "The Mission of the Wintergreen."

"The gentle white-capped nurses sped swiftly to and fro in the long corridors of the crowded city hospital, on their errands of mercy; but even their kind faces could not banish the gloom of the heavy-laden sky of which the patients could catch glimpses through the large windows, nor break the dreary monotony of the steady patter of rain against the window-panes.

"It was one of those cold cheerless days that sometimes come late in May.

"Out in the Women's Ward the patients did nothing but lie and stare through the windows at the cheerless, forsaken streets, or send, now and then, a stray glance of glad recognition as the nurse came to prepare them for the visit of their doctor.

"In the private ward where mother lay, it was even more lonely and cheerless, for when the doctor had made his visit and the special nurse had gone off duty, if the patient did not feel sleepy, there were only her own thoughts for company; save, of course, a book, if the doctor allowed it.

"Just then came the postman with letters, and, yes, there was a package.

"The nurse brought them in to where mother lay in that quiet lonely room so far from the loved ones at home.

"The letter (or rather letters, for the envelope was full of home letters—even Baby Boy did not forget to write each day to mamma) were opened and read, one by one, until there remained only the mysterious package.

"WHEN the nurse undid the wrappings she uttered a little cry of delight, for she saw the 'bright scarlet of wintergreen berries nestling on their bed of shiny dark green leaves. 'Oh! I haven't seen any of these,' she cried, 'since I left my childhood home away off in another state! How gay they look and how sweet they smell!'

"Mother offered her some and she pinned a festive little bunch onto the bib of her white apron, and another little bunch on the fold of the lace curtain at the window. It shone there like a ray of light from the far-off country home.

"At mother's request the nurse carried a little bunch to each patient in the Women's Ward, where its bright presence seemed to dispel the gloom, and bring a ray of hope into each stolid face.

"The Superintendent of the hospital, on her rounds, looked into the room, spied the bright berries, and stopped for a little chat because they reminded her of her home in far-away Canada.

"Later when the doctor came he gladly accepted a bunch for his button-hole, and declared they shed brightness all around.

"The Children's Ward was not forgotten—for it was the dear home children who had sent the token of spring, so a nurse was prevailed upon to carry a bunch to each child in the Ward.

"Even Minnie, the little foreign born waiter girl, lifted her hands in an ecstasy of delight at the sight of the bright berries, for had she not picked them often in her home across the sea?

"She took a little sprig to pin on her breast, and begged for one to take to the kitchen for Christine.

"So it was that the loving thought that prompted the children to send mother a breath of sweet country air in those shining berries and bright green leaves, not only helped mother but made a ray of sunshine for very many others in that great hospital.

"So the little plant fulfilled a great mission: It brought cheer, and that is alike indispensable to doctor, nurse, patient, and workmen. It is a boon from the Great Father to his children and as a poet has said—'God's smile is always a flower.'"

ONCE knew a settlement worker who loved bright colors, loved them above almost anything. Her little room, far down on a particularly crowded side street, was a marvel of gay cretonne, and cheerful chintz, of copper candlesticks, and flowers in a blue bowl.

"This room," she used to tell me laughingly, "is more than a room to me. It is an escape from the dirt and dinginess of the city; it is an oasis in the desert of the slums; it is a home!"

It so happened that a teacher in a mission house sent a little child, one day, with a message to the Settlement Worker. The little child was a small temperamental Italian with a love of the artistic and beautiful in her breast that no one, not even she herself, suspected.

The child came from the mission house, the message—which was a once

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

white note—clasped between a dingy thumb and forefinger. She knocked timidly at the Settlement Worker's door and was told, pleasantly, to come in. Shyly she pushed open the door and stood, gasping, on the threshold of what seemed a small Heaven to her amazed eyes. The note dropped from her dingy little hand.

"Ain't it—grand?" she breathed.

The Settlement Worker looked across the room into the soul of the little slum girl.

"Don't you want to come in?" asked the Settlement Worker softly.

The child stepped, like some one in a dream, across the threshold.

"I ain't never seen such a pretty place," she said slowly, "at home it's dirty—an' brown an' gray colored."

Well, the Settlement Worker kept the child with her for an hour or so, and when the child left she gave her some gay bits of cretonne and a handful of flowers and a long yellow candle.

It would make a long story to tell, in detail, how those scraps of bright color transformed that dull tenement room. But they did. They transformed it so much that an untidy mother set to work scrubbing floors, and a laboring-man father scraped the mud off of his shoes before he came in and—because his home was bright and attractive—he stayed in, instead of going to the corner saloon, after the evening meal. And the little child, because she was clever enough to work out the theory of cause and effect, decided that she would always keep the home neat and colorful.

That's the reason why a certain Italian family no longer lives in the slums. That's why a certain little girl, no longer a little girl, is a successful secretary to a big business man.

GOD'S smile may be a flower, or a bit of bright color. God's smile may be an expression on some stranger's face or a cheery look upon your own. God's smile may be the little bright incident that changes the day for you—or a larger, more potent something that changes your life!

Never doubt, no matter how full of sorrow and suffering and war the world may seem, that God does smile! Just look at the face of a crowd of little children, just listen to a choir singing, just walk at dusk into a dewy garden—and you'll know!

Spare your car from internal "Rough-House"

The lubrication of your passenger car or truck is as important as its make. For the finest make of car is a failure in service unless its multitude of engaging parts is completely protected by correct lubrication against destructive friction.

Havoline Oil gives you complete lubrication, never partial lubrication. Beware of the partial lubrication of an inferior lubricant that breaks down under heat and gear-pressure, causing an imperfect gas seal, loss of mileage on gas, scored cylinder walls, broken piston rings, shorter life of your car, and lower resale value.

HAYOLINE OIL

"It makes a difference"

Don't use an inferior oil, even occasionally. Use Havoline Oil. It does everything that a first-class lubricating oil should do or can do. It insures smooth, economical, and efficient development and transmission of power. It maintains a perfect, protecting film of oil between all engaging surfaces. Its proper use prevents that destructive internal "rough-house" of metal grinding against metal.

Ask for Havoline in the sealed container. Havoline greases are compounded of Havoline Oil and pure, sweet tallow. Clean to handle and correct in body.

Princeton in China's Service

IN these days when the country is calling its best young men to service, when the colleges are boasting that their youth have been the example of self-sacrifice for the whole nation, and when we are constantly being shown pictures of empty classrooms and deserted football fields, it is very easy for us to fall into the way of thinking that our institutions of learning are almost entirely inactive, having given of their very life-blood to the nation. In a sense this is true; but we must not forget that universities were built to produce men who can serve. And we must also not forget that, though the nation wars, there are other than martial or scholastic forms of service which the universities have long fostered.

One of those forms of broad and productive activity is missionary endeavor. In China alone there are at present half a dozen various enterprises—colleges, Young Men's Christian Associations and schools—each managed and largely supported by a single college at home. Among the most successful of these undertakings is the Princeton Center in Peking.

The Princeton Center was founded in 1907, though Princeton had had her representative in China for several years before that. It is a Young Men's Christian Association and has the Young Men's Christian Association organization back of it; but its foreign secretaries are practically all Princeton men, almost all the financial support that comes to it from America is Princeton money, and Princeton undergraduates consider it as an organization all their own. It is true that it received one of its biggest benefits from a man who does not hail from Princeton, for a benevolent out-sider erected the building; but with this start to work from, Princeton has done the rest.

THE situation at Peking is a peculiar one for a Young Men's Christian Association. It is the capital city of the nation; in it are assembled the pick of the official class; it is the meeting-place for most of the national assemblies, for parliament, for conferences, and for governmental machinery. No other city in China has such a history, such traditions, and such drawing power for the concentration of the best that is in China. And yet it is a city largely unspoiled, except for the legation quarter, by foreign intrusions. It is certainly the only one of the really important cities that has a negligible number of European business residents. It is typically Chinese, and the Chinese look to it with pride, as their own.

Where could there be a better opportunity for the great American undergraduate to begin his altruistic venture, to try to meet, on an equal plane, the student class of another great nation, a nation yet striving to be born, and still to produce a true first-cousin to the American under-graduate? It was here that Robert R. Gailey, the old "Tiger" football star, together with D. W. Edwards, '04, opened the Princeton center in China. And it is here that, ever since, Princeton University has been conducting her biggest and most vital class, a course in nation-building. This is the laboratory where Princeton men have a nation on their work-table.

EVER since the new building was erected in 1912, Princeton has been developing into more of a power in Peking every year. And ever since then, too, China has been developing into more of a reality in Princeton. You won't find a Princeton undergraduate now who doesn't know something of the problems of the Chinese, because his own University is taking a leading part in solving them. Why shouldn't he care? The Peking work now has the pick of three or four of the best men in the senior class every June to go to Peking and spend a year or two at the Princeton Center. For several years past the question has not been, in the minds of the university authorities, "Whom can I get to go?" but "Which of these men are most fitted to go?" This short-term service has been temporarily interrupted because of the war, but it is firmly fixed and will undoubtedly be as popular as ever when times again become normal.

WHEN any foreign enterprise has established itself in such terms as these at its home base, and especially when that home base is the haunt of the maligned undergraduate, nothing more need be said as to its success, from the domestic point of view. But when we cross the ocean, and go with some of these young fellows to see for the first time what Princeton is actually accomplishing on the firing-line, we find that the confidence and interest of the men at home is not in the slightest misplaced. There is so much opportunity, as every one knows, to get in some good hard whacks at things as they are in Peking. The living conditions of the average Chinese coolie, especially in a large city, are things to be whispered about and not mentioned in polite society. And the mental and moral condition of the great number of the upper classes is something less shocking in conversation but more horrible in its potential effects. Woe to the moral reformer in Peking! From the start he is a marked man, and opens himself to opposition, criticism, and even persecution. One of the local daily papers recently has summed up the general situation in the following terms: "Even in the worst days of the worst period of Imperial China, the philanthropist and the public-spirited were honored and held in high esteem. Today . . . they are abased and humiliated and thrown into prison like common rogues or criminals, at the pleasure of the police!" And so, though trying to alleviate, by all efficient methods, the misery of the lower classes, the Princeton Center has always held before its eye, as the highest consummation of its ideal and purpose, the education of some men, through the influence of Christianity, to become social reformers, and the upper-class majority to tolerate them. Its chief means is the instruction of the capital city youth, the future leaders of the republic, by practical courses, to the point where they will be able to decide, when their time for decision comes, that China will take her stand as a nation, and her people as individuals, with those "that love their brother men."

CHINA is no ordinary country. Battered about by the imperialistic forces of the world, she has become the grab-bag of Europe. There is being played on her territory now a game similar to that which caused the Great War of today; and that game will not cease until China is strong enough to notify the world that she will not tolerate an unwelcome guest, and yet sane enough to distinguish friends from selfish despoilers. As long as any of the present battling countries still talk conquest, there is ground for the opinion that the world has not yet learned its lesson. There is only one contingency that can preserve China's integrity, and that is that China herself become powerful enough, in an economic as well as military sense, to defend herself. Then, after she has become powerful, there is only one contingency that will prevent her from taking, ultimately, a merited revenge upon the perpetrators of her wrongs, and that is national Christianity—the difficult power of letting bygones be bygones.

It is therefore for the ultimate peace of the world and for the great triumph of democracy that Princeton is now striving in her work among the official classes. Princeton has now in her hands, through her representatives in Peking, the molding of a large number of those very men who, in the future, will have to decide these momentous questions. In a very real sense, therefore, Princeton has now a share of the responsibility of the future relations of one of the great races of mankind to the others. It is, to a considerable degree, hers to answer now: "Shall China continue to be a menace to the peace of Europe? Shall she continue to stumble along in the future as painfully as in the past? Or shall the right triumph, and enable her to rise like the phoenix from her own ashes and say: 'I am a nation, and I stand for the right'?" R. H. R.

THE soldier goes to meet the enemy armed and ready to exact the price of his life. But in every trench of the tortuous battle line in France are men who may not fight, who bear no weapons but who risk their lives equally with the fighting men in order that these may be kept right in mind, fit in body and ready in soul for the time of deeper testing when life-blood ebbs slowly through wicked wounds.

The chaplains and Y. M. C. A. secretaries are playing a big part in the will to victory of the armies of democracy. But war, no respecter of persons at any time, takes his toll also of these ministers to the spirits of men.

Last October, Rev. Walter Rue Murray, pastor of Holmesburg Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, resigned his pastorate to become a Y. M. C. A. Secretary. He was born in China forty-one years ago of Missionary parents, had graduated at Princeton, had been pastor at Havre de Grace, Md., and had served the Holmesburg Church as pastor for seven successful years. He had a men's Bible class of over 300 members.

Dr. Murray sailed for France on October 30th, 1917. For four months he was in cantonment work, at the last having charge of eight huts. He continued his Bible class work in the cantonments endeavoring to establish classes in each company. Then, after a furlough in May at Aix les Bains, he was sent to the front to face death with a unit which finally reached Château Thierry on the Marne. He took up this work on June 17th. A despatch from Paris, filed July 22d, told of his death. Two shells struck simultaneously before and behind him, and he was killed by the concussion. He was buried with full military honors in officers' row. He leaves a wife and two children who are now living at Orange, N. J.

In a letter to his wife written June 16th, he said: "I reach Paris about noon and will be immediately assigned to a more sacrificing task. This change is all within the line of duty and I gladly respond, and yearn for the good I may be able to give the boys doing the real bit in this gigantic struggle for righteousness and liberty."

To Evangelize Russia

THE First General Conference for the Evangelization of Russia was held at the Moody Tabernacle, Chicago, June 24 to 28. On Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday the Conference program filled the entire day. Among the outstanding features were addresses by Rev. A. B. Winchester of Toronto; President David Nyvall of North Park College, Chicago; Rev. Gust. F. Johnson, of Minneapolis; Rev. I. V. Neprash, recently of Petrograd; Rev. William R. Wedderspoon, St. James M. E. Church, Chicago; Dr. Robert M. Russell, Moody Institute, Chicago; President Charles A. Blanchard of Wheaton College; M. A. de Sherbinin, professor of Russian and Ruthenian, Presbyterian College, Winnipeg, Canada; Dr. James M. Gray, Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, and Pastor William Fetter, Russian Bible Institute of Philadelphia. In response to an appeal by Pastor William Fetter, over fifty volunteers came forward offering themselves for the service. It seemed to the leaders of the Conference necessary that a "Flying Squadron" of Christian effort should be organized at once to carry the Gospel by the written and spoken word to the Russian people. The effort of the Alliance will be to carry to the people a Christ rather than a creed, a personal Saviour rather than any particular system of faith and order. The promoters propose to raise a $3,000,000 Religious Liberty Fund for Russia.

WHAT ABOUT THE HIGHWAYS?

What we do in this war is definitely limited by our transportation facilities. Railroads and highways are now wholly inadequate. But only our highways are capable of quick and flexible expansion. Permanently constructed road systems, which will stand heavy motor truck traffic and connect main producing centers, are as necessary to winning the war as are ships and guns.

A main highway, "Somewhere in Pennsylvania"

Industry has been hampered because railroads could not carry the fuel and raw materials needed for the vast output of war. Motor trucks have had to go to the relief. But motor trucks cannot operate efficiently nor economically without a hard, even road surface that remains so in all kinds of weather.

Commerce of war has first call on our railroad facilities. Other business will have to take its chances. Short-haul rail traffic will be discouraged if not prohibited. Without interurban truck service over our highways, merchants will run short of goods and the consumer will feel the pinch of doing without.

Agriculture is making records to keep a steady stream of foodstuffs flowing from farm to shipping point and from shipping point overseas to feed our army and our allies. We at home must rely more and more upon perishable produce which cannot be shipped abroad. But a steady and abundant supply in city markets cannot be assured unless motor trucks can operate at good speed over roads which are passable every day in the year.

Labor is short. Every worker left at home has double duty to perform. Machinery must be made to multiply man power. Fast-moving and heavily laden trucks must replace teams and drivers — provided the roads permit. In this way time will be saved and many more men released for war needs.

War means quick movement of marching troops, endless motor truck trains, heavy batteries of cannon. And quick movement means broad, hard, even roads. Military authorities in this country have repeatedly called attention to our lack of strategic highways so solidly built that they can stand the weight and speed of military maneuver. Concrete roads should radiate from training camps, forts, munition, industrial and producing centers like the spokes of a giant wheel. They may some day prove our defense against hostile invasion.

Most war production is finally and completely consumed — wasted. Not so with the effort expressed in roads of concrete. They are an enduring asset destined, both in war and peace, to play as important a role in the development of national welfare and wealth as did the railways in an earlier era.

What it costs to build important highways of concrete is a small item compared with what they earn. The labor required is nothing compared with the man power they release and the wealth they create. Railway equipment needed for hauling the necessary materials of construction is an infinitesimal part of the transportation facilities they provide. Concrete roads are needed now to help win the war. They mean investing money in permanent construction instead of wasting it in temporary repairs.

Practical Recipes for the Family Dinner

FAR be it from me to criticize a department that is doing more good to the average housemother than all the government bulletins that are printed. One reason for this is that so few of us living off the main lines of travel and traffic ever see these admirable circulars except by accident. I suspect that we get the dream of them in our patriotic Corner. I have been interested in and profited by the discussions upon the "Staff of Life," and appreciate to the full the necessity of learning how to do without what we have been brought up to consider a prime necessary of daily living. What other women can do to instruct us how to do this without semi-starvation is worthy of all praise.

"But may one homemaker plead that 'man does not live by Bread alone,' even in war times, and ask that you let us have, once in a while, a sort of Variety Talk, comprising a soup or two, a meat-dish, a vegetable, and now that hot weather has asserted itself in earnest, a few cold sweet dishes that may be easily made—all economical, as suits our light purses? Should this respectful petition seem presumptuous, consign it to the waste basket and I shall not be hurt—only apologetic!"—NINA B. N. (Ohio).

Far from being offended by your frankness, I am myself so well persuaded of the propriety of stepping aside, now and then, from the Bread Line—important as it is, and must ever be—that I had laid aside for this week's issue of our Corner an assortment of letters containing recipes for what you suggest, together with some of my own that will, I hope, "fill the bill" you modestly put forward.

BEGINNING with the first course of a Family Dinner, we have a soup compounded to suit the times:

Soubise à la Russe

Heat a quart of milk in a double boiler, not forgetting a tiny pinch of soda; and when it reaches the boiling point, add a roux made by stirring together in a frying-pan over the fire a tablespoonful of butter (or a substitute for butter) and a heaping tablespoonful of flour until they are smooth and lumpless. When this is thoroughly incorporated with the hot milk, add a teaspoonful of onion-juice already squeezed from a chopped raw onion; season with white pepper and salt to taste and, one minute before taking it from the fire, slip in quickly a well-beaten egg. After the soup is poured into the tureen lay six poached eggs, neatly trimmed at the edges, and buttered, upon the surface of the creamy soup. Serve one of these eggs with each portion of soup.

Much of the excellence of this broth depends upon the seasoning. When properly mixed and cooked just enough, it will be relished at other seasons as well as upon meatless days. It is nourishing and easily digested by invalids.

Curried Tomatoes au Gratin

Blanch the tomatoes in boiling water to loosen the skin, peel them and place in a well-buttered fireproof dish. Mix one cupful of tomato sauce with one dessertspoonful of curry powder, and one tablespoonful of red currant jelly. Boil it up for two minutes, season the tomatoes and pour over them the prepared sauce, fine breadcrumbs and a little melted butter and bake in a hot oven for twenty minutes. Serve in a ring of plain boiled rice. Or you may serve the rice boiled and drained until each grain stands alone—in a separate dish.

Thirty years ago I learned from a returned missionary who had lived in India for forty years that raw chilled bananas served in the skins are a delicious accompaniment to curry of any kind. Since then I have never set a curry, smoking hot, upon the table without passing with it very cold whole bananas. A small fruit knife is laid by each plate that the eaters may pare and slice the fruit at pleasure. Those who have tried it once find the curry fiery without it. The combination is delightful.

A MEMBER, whose recipes, embodying substitutes have earned our gratitude favors us with two sweet dishes, the first of which is original with her efficient and generous self:

Rhubarb Betty

Cut up rhubarb, unskinned, into an agate basin to the depth of one or one-half inch. Sweeten to taste and sprinkle it with a little ground cinnamon (or nutmeg, if better liked). Spread over it a layer of crumbs with bits of butter. Add another layer of rhubarb and another of crumbs seasoned as the other layers were. Add one-half cup of water; cover and bake until tender; remove cover and brown. Serve hot or cold, with or without sauce.

Steamed Scotch Pudding

One-half cupful of sugar, one-half cupful of molasses; one egg; one cupful sour milk (or hot water); one cupful of sifted flour (rye or wheat); two cupfuls of bread-crumbs (dry); one tablespoonful of shortening; one teaspoonful of soda; one teaspoonful cinnamon; one-half teaspoonful of cloves; one cup of raisins. Steam two hours. Serve with pudding sauce or cream and sugar.—GEORGIANN T. (New York).

If it were in my power to correct the too general impression that the frozen desserts which are dearer to us Americans than to any other nation are now almost forbidden luxuries, I would make stronger and longer what I have to say prefatory to our Ohio member's request for "a few cold sweet dishes that may be easily made." What go, in foreign lands, under the generic title of "ices" need not be shut out from the family dietary in homes where they were wont to appear several times a week, and almost invariably on Sunday, canny housewives having learned that they might be made the day before, packed down in cracked ice and salt on Sunday morning, and

"freeze themselves" by dinner or supper time. Should readers wish to inquire further into the modus operandi of this labor-saving process, it will be a pleasure to me to describe it in full upon receipt of queries.

BUT to our recipes for summer desserts, at once good and inexpensive. First come two "surprises" that are rightly named.

Fruit Surprise

Prepare a quart of fresh fruit—peaches, berries, bananas, or apricots—the berries by crushing, the rest by mincing fine—and cover with two cupfuls of fine sugar. Add to this a half-pint of very cold water and the unbeaten whites of three eggs. Mix well, put into the freezer and grind, or turn, until the contents are frozen. The churning or grinding will yield a frozen fruit meringue. Serve with cream, plain or whipped.

Apple-Sauce Surprise

Have ready a pint of really good applesauce, plentifully sweetened and very smooth. Mix with it a cupful of cold water and the whites of three eggs. Blend thoroughly and turn into the freezer. Grind or turn until they are frozen. Wrap a towel, wrung out of boiling water, about the freezer and invert quickly upon a chilled dish. Eat with whipped cream or with plain. You will admit that the dessert merits the name, when incredulity is exchanged for pleasure in the eating. It is an inexpensive family dessert and one that "has all seasons for its own."

Frozen Rice Pudding

Another excellent and cheap family dessert. Make an eggless pudding of a cupful of rice, a small cupful of sugar, and six cupfuls of milk. Season to taste. Put over the fire in a double boiler and cook in a vessel of hot water until the rice is soft, yet not broken. Give it abundance of time. Every grain should be tender. Let it get cold and put into a freezer; pack down with rock salt and very finely pounded ice and leave for two hours. Open the freezer then, and with a long-handled ladle beat and stir from the bottom until the contents of the freezer are of custard-like consistency. Close the freezer, pack down anew in ice and salt, well over the top; cover with an old sack or blanket folded several times, and leave for two hours more. This, too, is a convenient Sunday dessert, requiring little labor and less time, early Sunday morning to have it ready for midday or evening repast. Turn out and eat with cream.

Young People's Topics for August 18

Using Our Pens for Christ

The Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. Luke 1:1-4; III John 1:1-14

THE First Epistle of John is a personal letter of the apostle to his well-beloved friend. The Gospel of Luke is also a personal letter.

Yet both have come down through the centuries ministering to the good of thousands who were unthought-of by the writers. In these days of telephones and of crowded hours we are too busy, and the writing of letters has gone into disuse. Yet nothing is so welcome when friends are separated as is the letter which really reveals the spirit of the writer and brings the breath of home to the ones afar, or the air of foreign places to those at home. And while we are writing, there is a wonderful opportunity for the saying of certain things which might not get said in ordinary conversation. Nothing is worse than a preachy letter; but nothing is better than a letter in which the writer thinks aloud of spiritual things. We who love Christ can do much with our pens, or, it may be, in these latter days, with our typewriters. There is that friend who is shut in, or that missionary friend who is as busy as three men, multiplying himself in the work to which he has given his life. Your letter will give him new strength, and his reply will widen your spiritual horizon. Write often to that boy or girl in the national service, in trench or hospital, somewhere at the front; you can send in the letter a breath of the life of home. They can't write much to you, but all that you may write to them will be read with eager eyes and beating heart. If you can't go, you can at least send yourself in your letters to those who have gone. Use your pen for Christ, and let it express your faith to those to whom, just now, you may not speak.

The Hidden Pillars of My Life

Epworth League Topic. I Sam. 1:24-28; II Tim. 1:5, 6; I Cor. 4:14, 15.

THE great Marshall Field building in Chicago stands on columns of concrete that fill wells driven to bed rock, 75 feet through the silt of the old swamp. The city of Venice is kept, by thousands of piles, from sinking into the ooze of the Adriatic marsh. So many a life of rugged strength rests on the hidden pillars of early Christian teaching. Samuel was dedicated to the Lord before his birth and was brought up in the temple, a true spiritual son of the high priest whose natural sons betrayed their birthright. Timothy learned of God, as you and I have done, through prayers taught at his mother's knee; and through the holy living of mother and grandmother he grew naturally into faith. It is a spiritual law of the Christian home that children should grow into grace and into knowledge of the Lord Christ. Some time, probably between twelve and twenty, each child will find it necessary to build upon the foundation of formerly accepted truth an edifice of vital personal faith. Then, though the struggle may be long, faith will ultimately triumph over doubt. We cannot be too thankful for the generations of godly men and women who have handed on to us a heritage of faith and virtuous living. Upon this heritage, as upon the hidden columns of concrete or the unseen piles, we must build, strong and sure, our own tabernacle of faith, our own structure of life and service.

Working in the Church

International Sunday School Lesson for August 18

Acts 2:41-47, 4:32-35, and 6:2-4

By GEORGE D. ALLISON, Ph.D.

OUR lesson texts picture to us the enthusiastic loyalty of the early converts to Christianity in fellowship, in service and in evangelistic effort. We see the first Christian Church a working church where it would be unthinkable for a person to be a "church-member" without being a "church-worker." Unlike a large proportion of present day Christians these primitive disciples did not think of themselves as passengers on the gospel ship waiting to be wafted to the golden shores, but took everyone his place as a member of the crew manning the various stations as lookouts, or as oarsmen, as helmsmen or as humble stewards, and every one was ready at an instant's notice to man a life-boat to save one struggling soul. The object of our lesson today is to help to bring us to a dynamic conception of the Christian life and to link up the latent power of our boys and girls in the classes of the Sunday school with the machinery of the organized church.

Diversities of Gifts

We need to read and reread Paul's great chapter, the Twelfth of First Corinthians. He was not one of those who had a narrow conception of Christian work. He never imagined that the only thing to do for Jesus was to talk about him in meeting. He believed in "Christian Endeavor" in the widest possible sense of that splendid term. So he could find a place for every member in the body of Christ, for head and hand and eye and ear. When he gives his mighty titles to the workers in the 28th verse of that chapter he inserts "helpers" in the midst of apostles, miracle-workers, governors and orators. There is not one of us who cannot qualify under that heading. And without helpers, apostles, governors or generals would preach and plan to small effect. The great war shows us that the heroism of the common soldier, his burden bearing, his fidelity, are indispensable. It was so when the Good News of the Kingdom first swept over the world. There were apostles like Paul, there were also ten thousand unknown "saints" whose names are written only in the Lamb's Book of Life.

The beginning of our Church work is to be put to use our obvious abilities. All our converts may be divided into natural leaders and natural followers. The leaders are to be assigned tasks and the followers to be enlisted as helpers, hearers, and workers. One youth is a genius at directing play and is put in charge of boys' games. Another reveals a talent for lettering signs and posters and achieves a useful career centering around his duties as publicity manager for the Church or school. A girl with a beautiful voice is given her opportunity to use it in gospel song. With tactful aid she finds she can speak a good word for Jesus in addition to singing his praise. One poor crippled lad with a keen mind became a mighty worker in "the League of the Golden Pen" writing letters brightened with verses and quotations to the hospitals and afterward to the soldiers and sailors. A whole group develops pure religion and undefiled by visiting the fatherless and widows in their affliction. A life work as kindergartner opens up before the young woman who "helps" with the littles tots, that their mothers may attend the church services.

Enlisting for Service

Even in the National Army the drafted man is given a chance to record his preference for lines of service. Modern churches are adopting the wise plan of giving scope to personal choice of tasks but taking it for granted that the new member has been saved to serve.

Have a class conference and list all the possibilities of Christian work in your church. Get the young people to suggest each item and then supplement their suggestions. This may lead to the use in your Church of an Enlistment Card somewhat along these lines:

As a working member of the Church I volunteer for the following lines of service:—

Training for Service

But very few of these activities can be successfully carried out without some training. We must imitate the Army and select some of our best recruits for the Officers' Training Course. In fact few men are now being promoted even to a corporal without a month in the "non-com" school. Yet the Church is electing trustees who have only the faintest and narrowest conception of their duties, and the "non-commissioned officers," as we may call the unelected workers, are usually raw beginners so far as training goes.

I have just attended the Summer Assembly where nearly three hundred chosen young people of the New Jersey Baptist Churches have received a great week of intensive training. I returned to advocate that each local church ought to have a brief course in such subjects as Leadership in Young People's Work, Teaching Elementary Grades, How to Do Personal Work and How to Study the Bible. Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Plans for Rally Day

IT is not too early to plan for Rally Day, September 29. In fact, the plans should have been made in June if Rally Day is to count as one of the school's big days.

Rally Day this year should be shaped as a great enlistment day. There is no school that has not some representative in service and others in prospect. Enlistment for Christ. Enlistment for special service for him. Enlistment of new members for the school. Enlistment for new school goals—all can be made a part of the day's plans.

Correspondence should be started at once to secure from each enlisted man of school or church, whether in America, France or England, some message to be read on Rally Day. If the replies are not all in by the day, secure from the relatives of the soldier an extract from the last letter received.

When the attendance on Rally Day is reported by the various classes the report should show any absences of enlisted men, and as this list is later read the messages from them should be read.

A special place of honor should be reserved for the parents and other relatives of boys in service. The school Roll of Honor containing the names should be draped with the colors.

The Rally Day postcard invitation should be a call to the colors.

A plan used in our own school is to make each department of the school a branch of the service. In the small school a class or classes, could constitute this branch. The Cradle Roll was the mosquito fleet, the Beginners the infantry, the Primary the navy, the Juniors the artillery, the Intermediates the airplane, the Seniors the officers training camp, the Adults the Red Cross, the Home Department the Home Guard.

The decorations were of course in the national colors, and each department had decorations to fit its branch of service. For instance, the Intermediate Department arranged a drawing of an airplane in colors; for the navy pictures of battleships were secured.

For each department a Scripture verse was selected as its motto appropriate to its service. For the Intermediate, "They shall mount up with wings as eagles," etc.

If the regimental plan is carried out the superintendent would be colonel, the department superintendent major, the secretary adjutant, the treasurer paymaster, the chorister drum major, the pianist chief musician, the teachers captains, and the pastor major general.

quarters will suggest books and outlines. Let us not let this lesson on "Working in the Church" go by without bringing these matters up in the Teachers Meeting of the School.

Last of all there is no method superior to sending out the recruit with a veteran. An afternoon calling with the pastor or an experienced worker will best show the willing helper how to help the sick and the lonely. The blackboard outlining and presentation by a real teacher of a lesson which the youngest addition to the "faculty" is to teach on the following Sunday will load the latter to a grip on the way to teach that no amount of abstract advice could impart.

We need the spirit of consecration first of all, make no doubt of that. But today's lesson reminds us that loyalty to Jesus and Christlike love for a needy world must find channels of expression or the very spirit may wane and vanish.

Historic Lines of Service

Right here at the beginning of the Book of Acts we see developing the lines of service which are still to be performed: First, the evangelizing of the untouched outsiders; secondly, the teaching of the Word to the new recruits; thirdly, the ministry to human suffering. We still need all of these functions. People today must be told who Jesus Christ is and what he wants. Conversion is but the beginning of the Christian's development—instruction, learning by doing, service are still to follow. What far-reaching ramifications of the simple relief work of the Jerusalem Church engage our attention today. Nothing is to be regarded as wholly secular. The temperance reformer, the worker for the abolition of child-labor, the Red Cross organizer and the settlement teacher are all doing Christian work, Church work. The old spirit is reasserting itself, once more Christians are not calling the things they possess their own. We have a most helpful social background for enlisting all our young people in definite lines of Christian service.

In Rally Day Suggestions (D. C. Cook Publishing Co.) these suggestions as to program are made:

9:30 A.M. Bugle or piano sounds "reville."

"Fall in" is called, each member in place.

"Attention!" School rises.

"Colors." Unfolding of American flag.

Salute to the flag.

Singing. "Onward, Christian Soldiers."

"Morning devotions" led by the colonel or a captain.

"Parade Rest." School is seated.

"Battalion drill." Little folks march in with flags flying, singing marching song.

Regimental inspection by major general.

Responses. Called for by colonel, answered by individual captains and others.

Our Enlistment. "For heretofore were ye called: because Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example, that ye should follow his steps."

Our Colors. "We will triumph in thy salvation, and in the name of our God we will set up our banners."

Our Uniform. "Put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil. Stand, therefore, having girded your loins with truth, and having put on the breastplate of righteousness."

Our Weapons. "For the weapons of our warfare are not of the flesh, but mighty before God to the casting down of strongholds. And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the spirit, which is the Word of God."

Our Rations. "Jesus said: This is the bread which cometh down out of heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die. I am the living bread, which came down out of heaven; if any man eat of this bread he shall not die."

Our Marching Orders. "Ye shall observe to do, therefore, as Jehovah your God hath commanded you: ye shall not turn aside to the right hand nor to the left. Jesus said, If any man would come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me."

Regimental Roll Call. Each captain gives attendance and enrollment.

Regimental Quartet. Church Choir.

Sinews of war. A cadet places an offering box shaped like a mortar on the platform, aims at pocketbooks, and audience marches about platform, dropping offering in the mortar.

"Forward March." An address by pastor. Closing with an appeal for enlistments in the army of God.

Taps and benediction.

Questions and Answers

TROUBLED", Allendale, Pa. If we may judge from your letter, you have done all that lies in your power to make amends for the injustice you did to your friend. We can believe, however, that it was done without deliberation and quite thoughtlessly; yet the arrow rankled in the heart of your friend. You have repented bitterly what you did; you have asked for divine forgiveness, and have written to your friend frankly confessing your fault and asking his pardon also. We think, under all the circumstances as your letter states them, it might be well to write him again, as the first letter may have miscarried. There is nothing further that you can do. The experience, however, should be a life lesson, showing the danger of forming hasty judgments of others and especially of saying harsh things. At some future time, an opportunity may arise to clear up the unfortunate misunderstanding and you should be quick to take advantage of it.

Reader, Portland, Oregon. The lines you mention are from a very old epitaph and describe the journey of life in these words:
"Our life is like a summer day;
Some only breakfast—and away;
Others to dinner stay and are full fed.
The oldest man but sups and goes to bed.
Large is his debt who lingers out the day;
He that goes soonest has the least to pay."

C. E. H., Bradford, Pa., gives this picture of the ideal American: "He believes patriotism is Christianity; that dishonor in political manipulations is evidence that the guilty would be dishonorable in their methods of Christianity. He condemns bribes, unnecessary expenditure of money, tricks of strategy to secure official authority. Ability and the record of manhood's merit are with him the only requisites which have earned honors of men and make him eligible to be entrusted with performance of public duty. Mark the careers of most distinguished Americans, springing from humble origin, entirely dependent on their intrinsic nobility of character—Lincoln, McKinley and many others.

Now, when vicious demons of barbarism menace our prosperity, we can almost see the sanctified faces of these men watching from heaven the nation they have made and preserved by martyrdom in the spirit of a crucified Christ for good of the world. Their prayer before an omnipotent God for truth to prevail is almost audible. Such characters are my ideal Americans and always win victory from every foe."

C. C. W., Mt. Vernon, O., writes: "Enclosed find a clipping from the Mt. Vernon Republican News (asking citizens to offer silent prayer for a blessing upon our armies). Why should not every Mayor of any city, town or village in the United States make a similar request of all the ministers of every denomination, to be complied with on every Sunday during the continuation of the war? And go a step farther and request that at the time appointed every Christian in the land, wherever he or she may be, join in these moments of prayer and also ask God to intervene to bring the war to a speedy close in triumph for the right."

Several Readers. The Mail-Bag must remind you that it cannot give attention to letters written in pencil. It frequently happens that pencil letters, before they reach our hands, are almost illegible.

A dear old friend in Boston, Mass., sends us a very heartening letter—one that is so warm and cordial that we wish it were in our power to meet her and greet her with an old-fashioned handshake. She lives in a quiet, beautifully situated home, facing a lovely park, which she can see and enjoy in all its summery bravery, looking from her window. Her life is given much to prayer and contemplation and she makes the best of her opportunities to serve God in doing kindly acts and in helping to lead others to Christ as Saviour. Hers is a life of real consecration. It is like a benison to get an occasional letter from such a friend and makes all the rest of the day worth while. We are passing her letter over to the Prayer League, where it will inspire others.

Rev. S. H., Norfolk, Va. Please explain John 3:3-5.

To understand this passage, it is necessary to remember that the Jews thought themselves "born of God" (see the boast of the Pharisees, Chap. 8:41) and that the promise of membership in the Messianic Kingdom was theirs alone. They had become familiarized, through the preaching of John the Baptist, with the thought that this Kingdom was at hand and hence considered themselves as about to be elevated to a new and high estate. This conclusion Christ dispels by setting a novel standard for entrance into the Kingdom, namely, the new birth by water and the Spirit, and this membership is open to anyone, not to Jews only.

D. H. O., Weehawken, N. J. The fig tree bears two crops—an early, ripe fig, which is crude and without flavor and valueless, and a later fig, which is full of sweetness and flavor and much esteemed. All trees bear the first crop, only good ones the second. The tree our Lord saw had not the second crop, for the time had not come for it; but it had not had even the first, for it had nothing but leaves, hence it would have no crop at all. The tree was a figure of Israel with its leaves of hypocritical pretensions to sanctity, yet being barren of real holiness. A true people would have looked to Christ to supply their lack, as did the Gentiles. The Jews, however, boasted of their externals—as temple ceremonies and good works—thus resembling the fig tree's leafy pretensions to fruitfulness. It is this pretense that the Lord curses, not the misfortune of being barren.

Mrs. E. E. G., Tecumseh, Okla. If you will supply the word "daughter" to the verse, 1 Cor. 7:36, etc., the meaning will probably become clear. The directions are given to the Christian father with respect to his unmarried daughter. According to the custom of those times, the father had complete control of his child, even as to her marriage, hence the apostle gives some directions how he should carry out this control.

T. J. R., Santa Cruz, Calif. Paul's office to Timothy (Acts 16:3) was an act of consideration for the unconverted Jew in that and in other countries. The son of a Gentile father and of a Jewish mother, and himself uncircumcised, he would run the risk of being regarded as an apostate from his mother's religion, and would thereby call down upon himself and his companion, Paul, that bitter animosity which would militate against their work.

Mrs. O. G., Baldwin City, Kan. 1. The robbers were placed on either side of Jesus at the crucifixion, probably for the purpose of carrying out the taunt that this was the King of the Jews, and these on either side of him were his subjects. It is now generally supposed that the two malefactors were companions of that Barabbas whose release the Jews had demanded and in whose place Jesus was martyred and killed. 2. Yes, God does at times hear the prayers of the wicked. A striking example is that of Manasseh (II Chron. 33:18). We can understand prayers of sinners for temporal blessings being unheard, for they are not at all in touch with the Divine, and hence their "sacrifice" and everything connected with it, was probably an abomination (Prov. 15:8). When, however, a sinner cries for pardon and for relief from his sins, his prayers are surely heard. God directs the wicked to come to Him for pardon. He heard the prayers of the people of Nineveh (Jonah 3:7-10). When the wicked man prays in sincerity for repentance and forgiveness, and for a godly life, he does not pray in vain.

A. B., Kasson, Iowa. It is generally understood that Matthew was martyred in Ethiopia and Mark in Alexandria; Luko, hanged in Greece; John, died a natural death in Ephesus; Peter, crucified in Rome; James beheaded in Jerusalem; the other James, beaten to death with a fuller's club; Thomas, pierced with a lance at Coromandel; Philip, hanged at Hieropolis; Bartholomew flayed alive; Jude, shot to death with arrows; Simon, crucified in Persia; Andrew crucified; Matthias, stoned, as also was Barnabas, and Paul was beheaded in Rome.

New Subscriber. Some of the more prominent passages from the Bible that declare for the immortality of the soul, are: Ps. 17:15; 73:24; Isa. 20:19; Ezekiel 18:4-9; 1 Thess. 4:13; Phil. 1:21; II Cor. 5:1; I Thess. 4:18; II Tim. 4:6-8; John 2:25; 22:43; Matt. 28:20; John 19:25. These are only a few, but convincing passages showing that the inspired writers had no doubt as to the soul's immortality.

J. H. H., Newark, N. J. The "fear" of God is to be interpreted in two ways: as a reverence and as a realization that God is a just God. The Gospel message is that God desires man's loving obedience, and when man gives that to God, all else needful will follow. He that recognizes in God not only a just judge but one who is willing and anxious to overlook and pardon for His Son's sake, will readily fall into that observance of the Christian virtues which go to make up the real worth-while Christian. He who has been served is willing to serve; he who has been forgiven is willing to forgive, he who has been loved is anxious to love, and he to whom much has been given, is always ready to give.

Mrs. G. F., Cold Spring, N. Y. The affairs of a social club are governed by its charter and bylaws. If none exist, then by vote of its members. Each society has the right to make bylaws to suit itself, and they control. If the bylaws of your association provide for the contingency mentioned by you the bylaws control; if not, the vote of the majority will rule.

J. C. B., Elizabeth, N. J. The passage in James 2:10 seems like hard doctrine, but is nevertheless true. The man who has offended in one point, is guilty of all, because he cannot longer stand before God on the ground of innocence. Having broken one law, he would be placed with the law-breakers. There is not, of course, the same degree of culpability as in the case of a greater offender, but his position before God is that of a sinner in need of pardon, as it would be if he were a sinner of deeper dye.

W. A. S., Milwaukee, Wis. How could Paul say that the Israelites in the wilderness tempted Christ?

Paul does not say that in I Cor. 10:19. He says that his readers are not to tempt Christ by such misconduct as the Israelites were guilty of. He urges his readers to free themselves from any idolatrous or wrong customs and motives, and not to become arrogant under their new belief and creed.

Mrs. R. A. H., High Point, N. C. Whether children grow in heaven is a question we cannot answer, as the Bible is silent on the subject. Conjecture is useless.

E. W., Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "Some time ago I was told to send my papers to one of our libraries, as they would send them to camps for our boys. I had a number of them. The Sunday after one of our boys came in, I was reading the last that had arrived. Harry said, 'Say, grandma, we had a fine lot of those papers brought to our Y. M. C. A. last week, and why did you leave one with your name on the label?' I thought I had rubbed it off all of them. If the dear Lord lets me live until April I shall be eighty years of age. I pray that God will bless the Christian Herald in all its work and its workers."

Your Stomach a Battle-Ground!

You Lower Your Health and Efficiency Through Improper Eating

THE nation wants man power; woman power. Uncle Sam pleads with you to keep your mental and physical strength at top notch.

Your own interests demand that you keep in good health to withstand the worry and strain of war.

Napoleon said that "an army fights on its stomach." It is just as true of the folks who fight in the trenches at home.

Your brain and your hands derive their strength from your stomach. If you permit your digestive organs to get out of order; if you eat foods that war with each other and upset your whole physical and mental system, you are not only failing to do your full part in the nation's work, but you are also permanently handicapping yourself in your own struggle for life and success.

There are many foods, good in themselves, but which when poured into the stomach in improper combinations, explode like chemicals, clogging your digestive apparatus with gases and undigested food, leaving you miserable, inefficient, unfit.

Of course, no one eats these combinations knowingly, and yet that is not an excuse. The Law of Nutrition is very simple. Eugene Christian, the Noted Food Scientist, has put it within the reach of all. When it is just as easy for you to tackle your day's work with brain and body sparkling with energy as it is for you to come to work sluggish and good for nothing, by all means put yourself on the right road.

Acid Stomach Causes Premature Old Age

It is probably a safe prediction that 90 per cent of all sickness starts with acid stomach. Men and women who have ills that make them think they are growing old, in many cases are simply suffering from poisons absorbed into the system through wrong eating. Many an ambitious young man or woman, while bending every energy to make a success in life, at the same time is ruining his or her career just by taking the wrong foods.

Remember that what you should eat depends on your particular physical condition, your age, your occupation, and the climate you live in. It is easy to keep your digestive organs in first-class running condition if you learn the first principles of how to combine foods for health.

In his Little Lessons in Corrective Eating, Eugene Christian gives you the benefit of his 20 years of study of food and its relation to the human system. The Lessons contain actual menus for breakfast, covering every condition of health and sickness from infancy to old age.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THE eight days of intercessory prayer from January 18 to 25 inclusive for the visible reunion of the Christian Church were observed in every part of the world and by Christians of every communion. A still more general observance is needed, and a more complete surrender of our hearts and minds and wills to the Will of God. The Commission of the American Episcopal Church on the World Conference on Faith and Order therefore again requests Christendom to observe the same octave in the year 1919 for the same purpose. But many who receive this request now may well spend six months in prayer that, through united intercession, Christians may have no will except the Will of God.

The following report of Pastor Cox shows that the Memphis Noon Meeting is still doing its appointed work in the same old way by the grace of God under the blood of Christ:

"A very interesting letter came not long since. Among other things the writer said: 'Do you remember the poor-looking wreck of humanity that strolled into your church about two and a half years ago, with his feet almost on the ground, whom you fed at your noon-day lunch, and also supplied with a pair of shoes through the City Mission? The Lord has been exceedingly good to me. Last Saturday I was elected cashier of a little bank here. You don't know how often I have thought of you and the real good you are doing and the way you helped me the little time I was in Memphis. From the bottom of my heart I say God bless you.' I look for a visit from him this summer.

"A dear friend in Alaska writes: 'About eight months ago I appealed to you for help. In a short time the Spirit led me to an old lady friend, to whom I told everything. She understood, gave me a book and several tracts to read, which taught me how to go to God in faith, believing that I would receive. Today I am so warm in happiness that I am unconscious of the six feet of snow which still covers our Alaskan gardens.'

"Many men in the army and navy are showing interest in the noon meeting and its work. This came a few days since: 'Dear Brother Cox: Just got back from France yesterday and was glad to get your letter. I distributed the literature among my shipmates. I don't think I joined the League. I am now sending you the signed slip. I wish I could get every man on the ship to join. I am praying for you and the prayer meeting.'

"A Memphis lieutenant who is letting his light shine for Jesus tells me this interesting experience in a letter: 'A number of men were standing around discussing the subject of prayer. Several said they had not prayed in years and laughed about it. One man who has been living a rather hard life said: 'Fellows, this boy (meaning the lieutenant) made me feel like thirty cents one night. Just as we were ready for bed he knelt by his bed to say his prayers. While he was kneeling I thought to myself, 'You big fool, to let everything in life pass out that was taught you by the dearest friend you had in the world—Mother!'' were speakers at the meeting. The point of interest in connection with these men, who are now Christian gentlemen, is this: In 1878 Kit Dalton was a member of the Sam Bass gang of outlaws in Texas. At that time Mr. Richmond was a member of the Texas Rangers and while the Sam Bass gang were attempting to rob a bank at Round Rock, Texas, the rangers killed every one of the gang except Dalton, who was then going by the name of Jackson. Thirty years later Mr. Richmond, who lives in Memphis also, was reading Captain Dalton's life story and recognized him as Jackson. He looked him up and they became warm friends. Both of these men take a deep interest in the noon prayer meeting, and Captain Dalton has joined the League.

"We are also greatly strengthened by the coming into our membership of Mrs. S. H. Hadley, of New York, who is the widow of S. H. Hadley, of the Water Street Mission.

"We crave a cordial interest in the prayers of the readers of this article for the many requests that come from day to day, some of them exceedingly pathetic. A note signed 'A Sinner,' says: 'The Lord seems so far away. I am the mother of two children almost grown. Please pray for all of us.'

"The fact that the Lord has manifested himself so richly and so gloriously as a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God encourages us to go on with the movement and to seek the co-operation of praying friends."

Mrs. J. L. H. asks prayer for two sons in France.

Mrs. E. G. asks the prayers of God's people for a dear son, who is trying to live a better life, but is weak and easily tempted.

Mrs. O. H. O. asked God's blessing on a revival at Croft, N. D., and now writes that the power of the Holy Spirit was signally manifested in a meeting which lasted from June 20 to 30.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Chilpey, Fla.; Perry, Ill.; Timpson, Texas (that many may be saved during meetings); Portland, Ore. (that a church may be blessed in its work for the uplift of the fallen).

A Friend, Waynesville, N. C., asks prayer that a minister may receive a suitable call.

Two parents ask prayer that sons' minds may be restored; L. M. B., that mother's mind may be restored; Mrs. C. B., that daughter's mind may be restored; A California Reader, that a friend's mind may be restored; three, for mental restoration for themselves.

Mrs. H. M. S. asks prayer that son's sight may be restored; N. S., that a dear old lady's sight may be restored; four friends, that their sight may be strengthened; J. H., that a lady's eyes may be healed.

Nine friends ask prayer for special blessings for others.

Twenty-nine friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Mrs. J. H. H. asks prayer that husband's hearing may be restored; P. M. M., that brother's hearing may be restored; twelve friends, for restoration of hearing for themselves.

Mrs. W. D. asks prayer that nephew and brother-in-law may be cured of the liquor habit; K., that a relative may be cured of the liquor habit; two parents, that sons may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. J. W., that husband may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. M. D. S., that nephew may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. D. J. B., that a friend may be cured of the habit.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

A. B., Johnstown, Pa.; A Reader, Winchester, Va.; Miss A. W. R., Bloomington, Ill.; Mrs. C. K., Jordan, N. Y.; A Friend, Waynesville, N. C.; A. H. A., Catskill, N. Y.; Mrs. S. J. M., Wilkinsburg, Pa.; M. E. S., Stewardson, Ill.; Miss M. P. S., Timpson, Texas.

How a Change of Food Restored Eugene Christian's Life

"Twenty years ago I was at death's door. For years I had suffered the agonies of acute stomach and intestinal disorders. Eminent specialists pronounced my case incurable and gave me up to die.

"I went out into the country—though scarcely able to walk—to think things over. I watched the animals on the farm. I noted the scientific feeding practices. I saw how with foods alone the farmer produced the results he wanted—how, to produce more milk, he fed his cows certain combinations of food; how, to put fat on hogs, he fed other food combinations; how to produce muscle in horses he fed still other food combinations. I learned that properly balanced rations produced just the results desired and I saw how improperly balanced rations produced wrong results.

"And then a great thought flashed through my mind. It was this: If scientific eating can produce such remarkable results for animals, why wouldn't the same treatment be effective with the human animal?

"Having been educated to be a physician myself, I determined to try some experiments. Soon I discovered a few basic laws. These I used as my foundation and gradually I began to improve until from a man who couldn't keep even the supposedly most simple meal down, I developed into a well man.

"Today I am nearly sixty years old and I haven't had a sick day in years. I work twelve to fifteen hours every day of my life and I never tire. I have more ginger, more vitality, and greater endurance than the average boy in his teens. And I owe it all to corrective eating."

The above is Eugene Christian's own story of his remarkable recovery through correct eating.

WOOD MAGIC

By Margaret E. Sangster.

When we roamed the woods together, you and I,
How each shadow seemed a vagrant butterfly!
How the violets hidden under leaves awoke our childish wonder,
When we roamed the woods together, you and I!

Did you feel the magic stealing,
Did you hear faint music pealing
Through the dusk as twilight creeping
Swept away the afterglow?
Did you know that elf land, leaping
From each thicket that seemed sleeping,
Watched us, as we roamed together?
Did you know?

Oftentimes they followed after,
Mocking us with silent laughter;
Dancing, prancing, sliding, slipping,

Falling out of line, and tripping,
Jumping, running, hopping, skipping!
Half afraid, but growing bolder,
I would glance across my shoulder.
Glance back almost furtively—
Ah, they weren't there to see,
But I felt them watching me
From behind each rock and tree!
Ready, when I turned my head,
To creep into line, and follow,
Over hill and over hollow,
Anywhere my fancy led!

When we roamed the woods together, did you know
That all elfland trooped behind us—silent, slow?
Did you hear faint music pealing through the dusk as night came stealing,
When we roamed the woods together long ago!

Questions and Answers

EDWARD P. STONE, Rutland, Vt., writes, "Lincoln taught that 'a new birth of freedom that shall not perish from the earth,' is 'under God.'" He adds: "I was a chaplain in the war of '61 and at Harrison's Landing, it was my privilege to be near President Lincoln and to study his wonderful face for many minutes, as he sat on his horse, silent and thinking. This was a short time before he wrote the first form of the Emancipation Proclamation. Now, I am a 'shut-in' for a long time, and not able to go about, although I can use my pen or pencil a little." Our invalid reader is fortunate in being able to keep in touch with the wonderful events that are taking place throughout the world, as his letter shows. Certainly, Lincoln's words may be interpreted as the expression of one who, looking deeply into the future, could foresee the struggle for freedom no longer confined to America, but spreading throughout the globe.

W. C. B., Philadelphia. Now that the war has made the thrones of Europe so insecure, I have often thought that the fact that monarchy is not God's form of government was clearly shown when he led the Israelites out of Egypt to make a nation of them. He appointed a leader, not a king, and gave the leader a code of laws to govern them; and when this leader died, God did not appoint his son as his successor, but a man best fitted for leadership. Years afterward when the people clamored for a king, God said to Samuel: "They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not rule over them. Show them the manner of the king that shall rule over them." Then follows that most accurate description of a king.

Israel was led away by the pomp and glitter of the heathen courts, and doubtless the Israelites had preserved the traditions of the grandeur of Egypt's kings who had made their forefathers slaves. It was not in line with the divine purpose that the Israelites should have a king, but the Lord gave them the thing for which they clamored, and then their troubles began. They were fairly warned, however. Samuel's words of warning have an application today, as modern history convincingly shows.

Rev. F. W. Russell, pastor of the West Presbyterian Church, St. Louis, writes: "I was very deeply interested Saturday in reading your article (urging American women to help in food saving). I sympathize with every line of it, but when I say that, I find my righteous indignation, I believe, rising higher these days when our wives and mothers are called upon to save in pittance and spoonfuls, the while the breweries are wasting by the barrel. I wish it might be possible for the outstanding Christian papers of this country, like the Christian Herald, to open a campaign against the awful wasting of much-needed grain in the entire brewery business of this country and England."

We entirely agree that it would be a desirable thing to prevent the diversion of a single bushel of any kind of grain to the manufacture of drink, instead of being used as life-giving food.

M. S., Hoteville, Ariz. There is no Bible passage that teaches any doctrine that makes of God a Moloch. The passage in I Cor. 7:14 has no bearing on the subject whatsoever, but rather the passage in Rom. 2:14, from which it would appear most plainly that if God does not punish those who did not have the Son, how much less would he visit punishment on innocent children and morally irresponsible.

Christ made no distinction between the children of believers and of unbelievers, when he called all children to him and blessed them.

M. E., Racine, Minn. The ancients had a saying that a sane mind could only live in a sane body. In other words, that when the body is sick, the mind also is easily affected. Therefore you must get well physically, and consistently have a blaspheming associate, nor one of loose morals, without running dangerously near to spiritual harm.

E. W., La Crosse, Wis. In Matt. 18:6 the Lord, by warning against offending even the little ones, includes any mistreatment of believers by other believers. He does not refer to a mere wounding of over-sensitive feelings, story of the overthrow of King Koong-ye, who ruled that country in 918 A. D., just a thousand years ago. He was a despot of the type of Herod or Nero, a monster of cruelty, and was at last overthrown by a rebellion of his own subjects, led by his ablest general, Prince Wang-Gun, who was the reverse in character of his brutal, war-loving, tyrannical master. Wang-Gun's rule brought great blessing to the kingdom and the people. It was one of the best periods Korea had ever known, and its influence for peace, national progress and prosperity lasted five hundred years or more."

Inquirer, Palo Alto, Calif. The American Greener gives the amount of the nation's drink bill in 1917 as $1,985,031,552 of which $291,800,074 was spent for coffee, tea, and cocoa, and $1,693,231,478 for liquors.

E. C. D., Mount Calvin, Texas. The state religion of Germany is not Lutheran, but a modernized blending of the Lutheran and Reformed religions, called "Unirt" or unionized. There is, however, a so-called Free Church in Germany that is true Lutheran. The latter has always been much maligned and bothered by the authorities, and has had to suffer much. In Austria the state religion is Roman Catholic, and in Bulgaria, Orthodox Greek.

The "Poor Pastor in North Carolina," whose case has been mentioned in the columns of the Christian Herald, writes us heartily thanking those readers who have shown an interest in his behalf. He has held no pastorate for two years, and his physical affliction stood in the way of resuming church work. He has sent to those who wrote to him a personal letter of thanks.

Mrs. C. S. S., Pittsfield, Mass., writes: "While looking over your daily paper over, I met this: 'Where to go tonight.' It told of different movies, theaters, dances, and so forth, for amusement. And I thought, under present circumstances and in view of the serious situation of our country, it would be far more advisable to go to the house of prayer, sending up petitions to the All-wise Father to save the unsaved in the war zone, to open blind eyes, unstop deaf ears, and enlighten minds of obscurity."

Capt. W. H. H. Phelps, Chaplain of The Gideons, writes from Atlanta, Ga. "In my younger days, I was a regular reader of your publication, especially when I was a Sabbath school teacher. I began teaching when quite a young man in Columbus, Ga., and later on in Brooklyn, New York City, Baltimore, and lastly in our city. If I am spared to see my 80th birthday, I anticipate tendering a banquet and reception to my former Sabbath school scholars. Doubtless many of them are living and engaged in the work. I wish to give publication to this fact in the Mail-Bag." We will gladly forward to Capt. Phelps the names and addresses of any of his former Sunday school pupils who may write us.

J. W. H., Toronto, Can. Prophecy has been so much neglected by the church, that it is impossible to tell how the ministry stands on the subject. A limited number, however, have made it a reverent study. Their number is steadily increasing.

M. T. W., Elmira, N. Y. We cannot expect thorough agreement in all things among students of prophecy.

Reader, Lodi, Calif. It is very sad to think that there are those who, in helpless and apparently friendless old age, are sometimes driven to pray for death. It may be poverty or sickness that induces this despondency. A kindly visit, an occasional word of sympathy, a helpful talk with some Christian friend would be the means of rekindling hope in many a heavy heart, and in reawakening trust in God and his goodness. We have sent your letter to the Prayer League.

C. K. C., Provo, S. D. 1. John Wanamaker was at one time Postmaster-General of the U. S. 2. We cannot be anything but loyal to our fellow-fighters in this war, and what is their grievance must of necessity become ours; hence it is our duty to make common cause with them against our common enemy.

SCARLET FLOWERS

By Margaret Langster

THE window box across the street
Is filled with scarlet flowers;
They glow, like bits of sunset cloud,
Across the dragging hours.
What though the mist be like a shroud
What though the day be dreary?
The window box across the street
Is warm, and gay, and cheery!

The window box across the street
Is filled with scarlet flowers;
I almost catch their perfume sweet. . . .
Above the sound of tramping feet,
They sing of country bowers.
Against the house that looms so gray,
They smile in—well, a friendly way.

A tired shopgirl hurries by;
Their color seems to catch her eye;
She pauses, starts, and wistfully
She gazes up. It seems to me
That I can hear her longing sigh. . . .
A little shopgirl hurries by.

A newsboy stops to sell his wares;
The crowds brush by him; no one cares
To buy his papers. But above,
The scarlet flowers bravely grow
In token of the Father's love. . . .
The crowd is brushed coldly by below.

A blind man stumbles, groping past;
He cannot see their scarlet shine;
And yet some memory seems to twine
About his soul.
For, oh, he turns
As trusting as a child who yearns
For some vague dream, and smilingly
He lifts the eyes that cannot see. . . .
A blind man stumbles, groping past.

The window box across the street
Is filled with scarlet flowers;
They tell a secret, tender, sweet,
Through all the dreary hours.
And folk who hurry on their way
Dream of some other brighter day. . . .
The window box across the street

then you will probably become better mentally, and will stop bothering your head with all kinds of doubts. The great Physician can heal you. Go to him with all your symptoms and worries; lay your case with all its mental aches and pains before him; trust him, and see how quickly you will be helped.

A. F., Los Angeles, Calif. The figure in II Cor. 6:14 is drawn from the unequal yoking of animals in a team, which was forbidden (Deut. 22:10): "Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together." The more immediate reference is to too intimate association with the unconverted at feasts, and especially to intermarriage with heathens. But the warning is no doubt meant also to include all entangling association of any character with those whose close fellowship would have a deleterious effect on our religious well-being. This applies as well to business associates as to those of a social character. The Christian must avoid not only all evil, but he is wise if he avoids anything that might lead to eventual evil, or which has a tendency to lower his moral or spiritual tone. This does not mean that we cannot have an unbelieving partner in business, for instance, but we certainly cannot or offending a morbid or incorrect sense of right, but by comparing believers to children, he would include new, humble, timid believers, those who but recently have come into the fold and who, by reason of its very newness to them, have not yet become accustomed to the Gospel and all it implies. He also includes a general lesson of being considerate of all the weak and helpless—those whom the world at large is wont to treat badly and who, because of their very weakness and worldly handicaps, are the Father's special care. Every believer is alike in the Father's regard and every believer is entitled to consideration and regard from other believers.

Mrs. D. C. T., Springdale, Ark. There is no passage in the Bible which says that children shall be denied the blessing of heaven. To say or believe anything like that would be making God a Moloch.

Reader, New York. "A missionary friend in Seoul occasionally sends me a copy of the Korean Magazine. It has frequently very interesting notes in its historical department, dealing with events that happened many centuries ago. In the March issue I find the

German Retreat, French Take Soissons

SINCE the first reaction of the Germans against General Foch's offensive there has been bitter fighting between Soissons and the Oureq with slight advantages falling to the Allies but with the Germans, with massed guns and men holding desperately the heights of the Chaudun Plateau which extended from Oulchy on the Oureq to the little River Crise and along the course of the Crise to Soissons. The taking of Oulchy and Villemontoire seriously imperilled the German position. The progress of the French and Americans northward from the Oureq took them in flank and rear and, on August 2, the Teuton resistance gave way completely and the Allied troops swept forward across the plateau, across the Crise and along the whole line through Fère-en-Tardenois, Serpy, Ville-en-Tardenois to Rheims. Everywhere on the long line the Germans were in full retreat toward the Vesle with the Allied troops in close pursuit. The gains of the 2d varied from two to five miles, the last advance being made north of Fère-en-Tardenois where the Germans were strongly entrenched in Nesle woods. The French were in Soissons on the 2d. The retiring Germans were burning villages and munitions dumps. The Germans' best troops were beaten and forced back.

The Yankee Beats the Prussian Guard

IT had to come sooner or later. Prussian arrogance, which had belittled America's fighting ability, had ridiculed her army, had declared that even if it got to France, which it couldn't do, it wouldn't count in the fighting, was due to be humbled. On July 29, on the hills overlooking the little Oureq River, the Prussian Guard met the Yankee divisions and was fought, not to a standstill, but to the rear. The Forty-second Division, the "Rainbows," and the Third Regular Army Division had the honor of taking at last, fully and completely, the measure of the Hun's best troops.

On the 28th the Rainbows had driven across the Oureq and had established themselves in the little villages of Serpy and Seringes, southeast of Fère-en-Tardenois. It had been the German plan to hold these villages; it was necessary to hold them and the rest of the positions along the north shore of the Oureq. If that line fell, great stores of munitions in the Woods of Nesle, between the Oureq and the Vesle, would be endangered. Enough had been lost already in the retreat. It was imperative that the Teuton line along the Oureq should be adamant.

Therefore, when the Americans, in utter disregard of the Crown Prince's plans, took that precious line away from the holding troops, something desperate had to be done. It was. The Fourth Prussian Guard Division and a Bavarian Guard Division, both of which had been held well behind the lines for the contemplated big drive against the British that was to follow victory at Rheims—two of the most élite of Germany's élite—were thrown into the fight to check and to drive back the Americans. For twenty-four hours the two forces were locked in deadly struggle. The first rush of the Prussians was in overwhelming force, supported by machine-guns and light artillery, and the Americans in Serpy got back across the Oureq. With the Germans in the town, the German artillery could no longer fire into it, and the Americans, disregarding entirely the German barrage fire, returned with fixed bayonets and drove the Prussians out. Again concentrated artillery fire made the village too hot for mortal men, and the scene was repeated. The Germans had concentrated a big squadron of sixty airplanes, piloted by their best aviators, against the short American line, and these supported the infantry with bombs and machine-gun fire at close range. American automatic rifles accounted for two of them. Back and forth the fighting raged all morning on the 29th. At last, just after noon, the American artillery got down a heavy barrage, which caught and drove back a Prussian charge, and when the enemy came on again, the Americans were too strongly situated to be dislodged. During the rest of the day the Americans held the village against all comers, and twice in the night, the shattered regiments of the Guards attacked in vain. The next day, July 30, the Americans pushed their way northward for two miles against the most bitter opposition, through barrage fire that seemed impossible to penetrate, against concentrated machine-guns that should have been impregnable, driving Germany's best before them and securing their positions, while at the same time, by their progress and the quality of their fighting, they made possible French advances both to the west and the east. On July 31 the American troops held a sharp salient projecting toward the Woods of Nesle.

"The Americans, after three days of to-and-fro fighting through villages, had learned subtlety and were determined to have a real fight to a finish. They consequently withdrew as if retiring from Seringes and the Germans crept down from the high ground, convinced that they had their opponents beaten.

"But as the new occupants began to organize their defenses they found that bullets appeared to be coming in from three sides of the village. The Americans, while withdrawing from the front of the town, had begun an encircling movement on both sides, thus forming a ring almost completely around it.

"Then came tragic fighting. The Prussian Guard had voted not to surrender and their opponents were just as anxious to see the thing through. It was an affair of small arms, but the Americans proved better shots and slowly picked off men here and there.

"Then the Americans began to advance and slowly their encircling ring closed about the village. As the ring drew closer and the defenders saw their doom approaching, they redoubled their fire, but still the Americans came on unfalteringly like a storm or the unavoidable stroke of fate.

"When the Americans reached the precincts of the village their fire ceased and, with one wild yell, they closed with the foe. The fierce uproar suddenly gave place to a strange silence as man grappled with man. Only the clash of steel on steel and the groans of the stricken could be heard.

"The issue was never in doubt for an instant. At this kind of fighting the American is more than equal to any Prussian Guardsman, and in a little more than ten minutes all was over. Except for a few prisoners, every German in the village had breathed his last. Such was the final capture of Seringses.

While the Americans fought clean and fair, the Germans tried various tricks. In Serpy they mounted five machine guns in a building marked with the Red Cross. American bayonets avenged this smirching of the international badge of mercy. Near by a squad of Germans advanced behind a white flag. At one hundred yards the Americans let loose a concentrated fire and annihilated the Huns. The white flag was tied to the handle of a grenade and each dead German was loaded down with the deadly missiles. Other Germans waited behind their machine guns until the Americans were close, then fired as long as they dared and rose up with the cry of "Kamerad." Every one who fired at less than 200 yards' range was killed.

ONE platoon of fifty men started for Serpy on Sunday morning, the 28th. They crossed the Ourcq through a sweeping fire from machine-guns. Only twenty-one of them reached shelter, poor shelter at that, in the battered village. They were raked by machine guns and snipers. Three machine guns in a building marked with a Red Cross kept picking them off. But they had been ordered to stay there, and they stayed. They fired nearly all their ammunition at the Red Cross guns then they rushed them, but had to fall back again to their shelter. One by one their officers all fell, and the privates elected commanders from their number. When the gallant band was at last relieved at 7 P. M., the two remaining were still firing at the machine guns up the street.

In pressing north from Serpy toward the Meurcy Farm, which the Americans took on the 30th, the advance was through wheat fields sprayed with machine gun bullets. Observers saw shells tear long gaps in the line, but it went on. The group of farm buildings was strongly organized as a machine-gun post, and was only taken after desperate fighting. The Yankee troops bayoneted the Prussians at their guns. It was a battle without mercy, in which the American troops outfought and outwitted the Prussians and Bavarians, who fought desperately and well.

THE same correspondent with the Americans thus described the last fight for Serpy: "The assaulting troops formed upon the south side of the Ourcq, in open ground. The enemy opened a heavy fire of artillery and machine guns along the slopes east and west of the river. The ground in front of the advancing lines was plowed by "The men went steadily up the slopes, silenced one after another the German machine-gun nests, and swept on to the top of the hill, then, wheeling eastward, stormed the village. It was a fierce fight. There was no asking or giving of quarter. The enemy was stout-hearted and the Americans were glad to find him so. They wanted that sort of a finish to their ordeal. Some of the Germans fled into Nesles Forest. The remainder are where they will remain—in the village."

At one village a German counter-attack had forced the Americans to retire. The enemy commander sent a man out with a white flag to ask the Americans if they wished to surrender.

"No!" yelled their commander. "We're ready to attack." And they did, and took and held the village.

JULY 31st saw no infantry fighting between the Americans and the beaten Prussian Guard. For the first time in its career the Guard had accepted defeat. Before, it had always gained its objectives. This time it failed, beaten by better men, and all day it lay sullenly in the shelter of Vesle woods while the artillery filled the American lines and back areas with high explosives and poison gas.

The Germans, very evidently were planning to stay on the Ourcq, but it takes two to make a bargain and the Allies were not agreed. They preferred the line of the Vesle or the Aisne, and the Rhine would suit them even better. That the latter is not beyond the horizon of German vision is indicated by an address issued to his army by Kaiser Wilhelm on July 31st in which he outlined the victories of German arms, east and west, and told his troops, "You are in the midst of the hardest struggle. The desperate efforts of the enemy will, as hitherto, be foiled by your bravery. Of that I am certain and, with me, the entire Fatherland." Even the Kaiser sees inevitable defeat looming up before him.

TO stop the American advance, Germany concentrated her best troops and her biggest movable guns and her most daring flyers. For the time she outnumbered the Allies in the air and her planes bombed and machine gunned behind the advancing allied lines day and night in a desperate attempt to relieve the pressure on the hard pressed Imperial army. They swooped down over columns of troops and convoys of supplies and cut loose with the enemy's fire, and the advance was obscured by clouds of dust from the cornfields through which they were marching. Nevertheless the men forded the river with drill-like steadiness. It was a wonderful performance for any troops, astounding for troops so recently blooded, and as fine a test as any to which the American Army has been put.

THESE days of fraternizing and union of American and French soldiers on the most friendly and brotherly terms, on the soil of France, remind us forcibly of the last visit of General Lafayette to this country, ninety-four years ago, when he landed in New York on August 15, 1824.

This nation poured out its gratitude lavishly upon General Lafayette, who had so unselfishly labored in behalf of its independence. To this day the memory of that visit is cherished with a peculiar veneration by all true Americans, and will continue to be thus cherished while true Americans live upon the soil that the noble Frenchman helped to make free. Like "bread cast upon the waters, found after many days," is the new bond of union, formed when the American soldiers under General Pershing went over to friendly France to help fight the battle for the world's freedom.

Two of the most memorable incidents in the course of that never-to-be-forgotten visit were General Lafayette's visit to the tomb of Washington at Mount Vernon, and his appearance at the laying of the cornerstone of the Bunker Hill Monument.

The visit to Washington's grave still abides. The solitary descent into the tomb, the silent prayer beside the easel of the illustrious man he had so loved and trusted—can our people forget it? Can we ever cease to be immensely inspired by the thought of it?

It must have been an intensely thrilling moment when Webster, at Bunker Hill, turning to Lafayette, exclaimed:

Fortunate man! You are connected with both hemispheres and with two generations. Heaven saw fit to ordain that the electric spark of liberty should be conducted through you, from the new world to the old; and we who are now here to perform this duty of patriotism have all of us long ago received it in charge from our fathers, to cherish your name and your virtues. Behold! They now stretch forth their feeble hands to embrace you. Behold! They raise their trembling voice to invoke the blessing of God on you and yours forever!

Lafayette's Birthplace

THE quaint Château of Chavaniac, where Lafayette was born, lifted on its rocky bluffs, is in itself impressive enough to constitute an appropriate memorial to Lafayette.

And this is happily what has happened. The historic birthplace of the French hero has been acquired and dedicated to the service of France for all time. The Château of Chavaniac dates from the fourteenth century. Lafayette was born there September 6, 1757. The property had long been the home of the Lafayette family who were distinguished for bravery in battle; for their principles of justice in council; and for their fair and kind treatment of the hundreds of peasants on their estate.

When Lafayette went off in 1777 to aid the struggling American colonies to get their freedom he left his youthful bride (the talented and brave Adrienne d'Ayen) at Chavaniac. She received from him there many letters among which was one written on shipboard, just as he sailed away. In this letter Lafayette said:

Whilst defending the liberty I adore, I shall enjoy perfect freedom myself, I but offer my services to that interesting Republic from motives of the purest kind, unmixed with ambition or private views; her happiness and glory are my only incentives to the task. I hope that, for my sake, you will become a good American, for that feeling is worthy of every noble heart.

While he was absent Lafayette received word from Chavaniac of the birth there of his only son, George Washington Lafayette, who inherited the estate at the death of his father in 1834.

In 1791, the Château was completely restored by Lafayette who had then become a famous general and champion of liberty both in America and France. A year later, the "reign of terror" began in Paris. Lafayette, who had been so idolized by the people that his journey from Paris to Chavaniac in 1790 had been a continual ovation, was pronounced by the Jacobin-ruled national assembly a traitor to his country! Accompanied by a small group of patriots, he fled from Chavaniac, intending to go into exile in Holland, but was captured and held prisoner by the Austrians and Prussians for five years. During that time the Château was pillaged, confiscated, divided off, and sold as national property. The estate was repurchased in 1795 by Lafayette's aunt, the Comtesse de Chavaniac. And two years later General Lafayette worshipped again with his family in the little village Church of Chavaniac.

The quaint old Château, associated with the birth and youth of the great liberator, has now become a national institution through the initiative of American patriots, aided by a French committee formed to co-operate in the enterprise, among whom is the Marquis Lafayette, great grandson of the Revolutionary hero. Besides providing a shelter for deserving dependents of war, the ancestral home of Lafayette also serves as a center of patriotic inspiration by its use as a museum for many valuable historic relics connected with the life and work of the great and honored Lafayette.

Going Back to Palestine

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.

Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

WHO can remember a time when so much was written and talked as now about the Jew and Palestine? There is a feeling in the air, "a going in the tops of the mulberry trees," that presages something of great importance in that direction before long.

But what a mystery it all is both to the Jew and the Gentile, to the learned quite as much as the unlearned, when they are ignorant of, or set aside, the only infallible guide and interpreter, the inspired Bible!

Here comes a distinguished publicist in a French journal, whose name need not be mentioned, and who says, oh, so many queer things and asks so many queer questions! Queer, that is, to those who are familiar with and believe in the teaching of Holy Writ. And he is being quoted, also, as an authority on Jewish nationalism and Palestine. But, as Jeremiah says, he is speaking a vision of his own heart, and not out of the mouth of the Lord (Jer. 23:16).

I
HE wishes to know whether Israel has the right to become an autonomous nation in Palestine? "Is it, for that matter," says he, "even to its own interests?" We might reply by asking what right has any people to become an autonomous nation in the land of its fathers from which it was forcibly expelled? And when the answer came it might be found that even on the natural plane of things Israel had as good a right as any nation on earth.

But we can not think of Israel on the natural plane of things. Israel is supernatural. She is supernatural in her origin, in her past history, in her present dispersion and preservation among the nations, and in the future in store for her. There is a wealth of Scripture to substantiate each of these declarations, though space permits the mention of only one, Jeremiah 30. It is in that comforting prophecy, the study of which we urge upon our readers, that Jehovah says to her, "I will make a full end of all the nations whither I have scattered thee, but I will not make a full end of thee" (R. V.).

II

BY what right do they claim the soil?" this writer asks. "Has a people that has voluntarily left a country an inalienable right to it, after the lapse of centuries?" We reply that Israel did not voluntarily leave her country; the Romans drove her out of it. And they drove her out according to "the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God." Even her expulsion was supernatural. It had been foretold by Moses in detail nearly 1,600 years before (Deut. 28:49-57), and when she was expelled, her restoration was predicted and assured (Luke 21:24).

Moreover, Israel's claim to the soil of Palestine is divine. The Bible as a revelation from God stands or falls with that affirmation. Men speak of the "right of eminent domain," but in the case of Israel and Palestine, we see "inherent sovereign power in the control of property for public purposes" exalted to the highest point. Her title deed is written in Genesis 12:7; it is confirmed by covenant and the territory surveyed and marked out in Genesis 15:18-21, and again and again in Sacred Writ is the transfer declared to be non-forfeitable and in perpetuity. "For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever" (Jehovah to Abram, Gen. 13:15).

III

THIS writer thinks it strange that "the Jews, who speak ever of right, justice and liberty, should concern themselves so little about the rights of the people in Palestine today." The Zionists, he thinks, would offer them a money indemnity, but he believes it doubtful whether the peasants now cultivating the soil would accept it.

The reference to the Zionists discloses his point of view. Zionism is a widespread movement among the Jews, having as its object the solution of the Jewish question by the resettlement of the Jews in Palestine. There is a political Zionism and a religious Zionism, but both aim in the same direction.

All honor to Zionism! Its motive is good, its spirit unselfish, its zeal heroic. It may be an instrument which God is using, and will use, to execute his plans for Israel in part. But if the prophets are rightly understood, there is as great and as exalted a difference between God's plans and those of Zionism as there was between his plans and those of Moses when the latter attempted to deliver Israel from Pharaoh by slaying an Egyptian.

The problem of indemnity to the peasants offers no difficulty to the "Judge of all the earth who doeth seasons rotate still as in Bible times; that the springs and streams mentioned in the Bible still flow; that the rainfall is sufficient if it were only stored, and that the climate could easily be improved by drainage and the planting of trees.

The Rev. G. E. Post, who also knew the country well, and who writes still later, testifies, as Mr. Hyamson says, that the climate of Palestine is adapted to the existence of a large population. The plain around Gaza grows the finest barley in the world. The plain of Beisan is a land of wheat. The mountains of Judah were aforetime covered with olive groves and vineyards, and there is no reason why they should not be restored to their ancient condition. The so-called desert of Judea is capable of supporting innumerable flocks and herds. The crops that now respond to the primitive Arab methods of cultivation are a standing evidence to the natural fertility of the soil, where, as in Gaza and Siloam, the land already yields a hundredfold.

But we are not dependent upon man for this evidence, for God himself hath spoken it. His promise is that Israel shall be multiplied above her fathers (Deut. 30:5). "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that the plowman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed; and the mountains shall drop sweet wine, and all the hills shall melt" (Amos 9:13).

THE crux of this whole matter is the Jew's religion. "Ask the French Jews what they think of the tolerance of their co-religionists in Palestine," our publicist exclaims. "Of course, not all are equally narrow and bigoted; but one may readily imagine that not all Jews will be gratified to see that type loom up in the Orient which will perhaps excommunicate them every morning."

The animus underlying this remark is of the Antichrist, who, when the Jews are back in their land again, "will confirm a covenant with many for one week," i.e., for seven years. Political rather than religious Zionism will be in the ascendant at first, when the Jews go back, and the Antichrist will find a favorable opportunity among them for the development of his malign purpose. But the so-called intolerant, the "remnant" who will not "bow the knee to Baal, and whose lips have not kissed him," will resist him unto death. That will be the hour of Jacob's trouble, but, thank God, he will be delivered out of it. The coming of the Lord is his hope, and resting in it he will not be confounded.

These things are necessary to be known and to be witnessed to, as an offset to the erroneous teaching—the groping in the dark—which fills so many pages of current periodicals. The people of God must not be led astray for lack of hearing his side of the matter, for his honor is at stake in the fulfilment of his promises to Israel, and through Israel to the whole world. Moreover, the whole world just now needs the comfort and encouragement, the optimistic outlook, which can be produced only by the assurance that God has not forgotten it, and that the clouds now big with mercy will yet break in blessings on its head.

The Next World's Convention

THE next convention of the World's Sunday School Association will be held in Tokyo, Japan, soon after the close of the World War, and it is proposed to erect a temporary building along the lines of the evangelistic tabernacles used in this country. It is thought that 150 or 200 workers will be present from Korea, and 200 or 250 from China, and that the Japanese will flock to the convention, while at least 2,000 visitors will come from America, Europe and Australasia.

British troops in Mesopotamia enclose within their trench system this excavation of the Ksar, in which is a basalt lion supposed to represent Babylonia's victory over Egypt in a war long past right." The problem primarily is not one of individual ownership but of government control. What power now controls Palestine, and what is the nature of its claim and the terms of its lease? One must go to the Bible for an answer to these questions, where he learns that Gentile occupancy of Palestine is only temporary and punitive.

Assyria, representative of all the Gentile nations in relation to the Jews, was merely the rod of God's anger and the staff of his indignation. He sent her against a hypocritical nation (Israel), and against the people of his wrath did he give her a charge (Isa. 10:5, 6). But she "helped forward the affliction" (Zech. 1:15). She went further in the exercise of her prerogative than God purposed she should, "Wherefore it shall come to pass," said he, "that when the Lord hath performed his whole work upon Mount Zion and on Jerusalem, I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria, and the glory of his high looks" (Isa. 10:12).

The reference to "right, justice and liberty" has another side to it. The Canaanites occupied Palestine before the Jews entered it originally, by whom they were expelled by divine fiat. And that fiat was in the interest of "right, justice and liberty," and it will be so again.

IV

NOTHING is more surprising in the article under consideration than the statement that "Judea will always remain an arid mountain region with a fertile strip along the sea." The writer admits that "Galilee is more fruitful." Surprising, because we have just read the recent authoritative work of A. M. Hyamson on "The Rebirth of an Ancient Nation," who reminds us that Palestine is not, and never has been, a desert, in the colloquial sense, but a land laid waste. Colonel Claude Conder, whom he quotes, and than whom no one knew Palestine better, was always impressing his hearers that it was not desolate; that the forests had not been destroyed; that the

God's Great Out of Doors

TEXT—Job 36:29. "Can any understand the noise of his tabernacle?"

IN mythology we are told of a very wonderful building somewhere betwixt heaven and earth. The walls are of resounding brass. A thousand entries and windows are concealed from human sight by glorious foliage. There are no doors to shut, so they stand open night and day. Through the many openings all sounds of earth and every word that is spoken enter, and the discord roareth every way, then passeth out through the same apertures, ascending to Olympus as entrancing harmony, well pleasing to the gods.

What a pity this ancient fantasy is not a present-day reality! How unfortunate that the Bible contains no corresponding conception! Ah, but this extraordinary building is a reality, and we find it described in even greater detail in the Word of God. What is more, we discover its location is not so remote as the ancients thought. The building, well within the border of our work-a-day world, is tangible and always accessible. So follow me, if you will, that I may lead you into a dwelling-place of God, where every jarring note of this discordant age will be transformed into melody.

A tabernacle, Elihu calls it. The allusion is to nature—God's great out-of-doors. "Can any understand the noise of his tabernacle?" Much depends upon the answer one is able to make to the question.

JOB was in great trouble, consequently sore perplexed. Having lost property, loved ones and health all in a twinkling, he finds himself plunged into that tangled woodland of speculation well known to the afflicted. He must find his way out into the clearing, to God and light and intelligent understanding. Being a good man, he first turns to theology for comfort, and theology breaks down utterly under the weight of so great and undeserved woe. Quite naturally then he looks to his friends. But friendship fails in this crisis. He dismisses them with the words, "miserable comforters are ye all." He seeks consolation from his wife, and the only light she is able to throw upon the problem is "Change your religion. There must be something radically wrong with your belief in Providence and the profit of godliness. Surely a loving God would not permit you to suffer thus. Curse God and die!"

Finding his trusted supports gone, Job is thrown back upon his own intellectual processes. His mind wanders about blindly through the universe crying, Why, Why, Why? But there is no answering voice. No sound comes to his ear but the ceaseless grinding of the wheels of that remorseless machine known variously as cosmos, force, law. No benevolence looks its compassion upon him from the eyeless sockets of fate. He senses no warm thrill as, reaching up out of a sea of trouble, he grasps the dead hand of philosophy. He is desolate, alone, defeated before the mystery of being. Yet not alone, for in his extremity God finds the afflicted man, and with loving hand conducts him into the temple of nature, that he may there read the meaning of it all, and come at last to know the harmony of life, which too close proximity to single blatant notes has made it impossible for him to discern.

THOSE hours alone with God out-of-doors were the greatest of Job's life. It was an experience never to be forgotten. He was shown the foundations of the tabernacle, the beams laid in light, the dome as of molten glass supported upon pillars of morning and pillars of evening, and the many encircling galleries, mountain upon mountain, tier above tier. His attention is called to the sunrise tapestries, the verdant carpeting and the starry chandeliers, particularly the clusters of the Pleiades and Orion.

"You shall now hear my great organ." So saying, God drew the vox-angelica stop, and Job heard the music of insect life; the flute and piccolo stops, and he listened to the music of bird life; the trumpet stop, and the instrument gave forth the rich, strong tones of animal life. Then came the dulcimer, the music of pattering rain-drops. Finally the deep-throated double open diapason was heard as reverberating thunder shook the temple to its very foundation.

At this psychological moment the Almighty turned suddenly upon his perplexed servant with the question, "Where wast thou when I made all this? Tell me, if thou canst." Job has no adequate answer. His soul has been stirred to its utmost depth. In a hushed whisper of reverential awe and humility he speaks, "I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee. For the first time I understand the noise of thy Tabernacle. I see it all quite clearly now. I live in a universe of intelligence, power, order, concord and benevolence. Forgive me, Lord, that I ever misjudged or doubted heaven's blessings or thee."

"So be it, troubled heart. Now that thine own soul hath found the peace of God, pray. Pray for the theologians, thy friends, thy wife. Pray for the world, that all may understand the noise of my tabernacle."

He prayed that day, prayed as never before. The service over, Job went back to his complex life to meet at the tabernacle door faith, health, and prosperity more abundant than he had ever known before.

HAVE we so read Job? No? Then, dear friends, we have never read the book at all. This immortal epic of the inner life reaches its climax in the six beautiful nature chapters with which it closes. One hundred and sixty verses of God's unspoiled handiwork, in every one of which is seen Almighty power, divine providence, and undeviating good will. The lesson is this: A universe in which is clearly seen a living will cannot be purposeless.

Thus far I have sought to surround you with the atmosphere of the text. Now let us enter his tabernacle, that we may find for ourselves all that Job found. Habitually men of old, when hard pressed by inexplicable circumstances, sought peace and comfort out of doors alone with God. "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills whence cometh my help," is the key to the Psalmist's trustful though checkered life. I see Elijah in those hours of reaction following the greatest triumph of his life. Faith spent from that shining victory for God on Mount Carmel. Physical strength spent from running so far after the King's chariot. There he sits beneath the juniper tree depressed beyond words. "What doest thou here, Elijah?" God asks. "Lord, everything has gone to smash: religion, theology, thine altars, thy prophets. I am the only one left, and they seek my life." Of course, there is not a word of truth in much of this, but no use to argue with a man when he is in such a state of physical and spiritual collapse. He must have rest, sleep, food. These God provides. But he needs something infinitely more. He must get hold of himself, get back his faith, get a firmer grip upon God. This he succeeds in doing under circumstances as fascinating to me now as when read to me in childhood by a Christian mother. Elijah regained his faith at an organ recital in nature's temple. He had a choice box seat in a cleft of the rock. The divine organist used that day the earthquake stop, the fire stop, the wind stop. As the music of the still small voice enswathed and caressed him, Elijah felt his weariness and despondency dropping from him as clothing from the tired body at bedtime hour. "Why!" said he, "there is order, harmony, love, after all!"

WHERE, if not out of doors, alone with God, did Jesus refresh his soul, strengthen his faith, and make resolute his purpose? Long days and nights in the wilderness, nights of prayer in the mountains, alone with God in the garden—here were the ever-flowing springs from which he slaked his thirst for the highest and best.

Again the summer is upon us, and so far as possible let us seek refreshment for body, soul and spirit amidst templed hills, cathedraled pines and peaceful countryside. Man made the cities, God made the country. If we have lost God amid the maze of daily life we shall find him yonder.

It has been a year of unprecedented perplexity and world-engulfing sorrow. One is positively bewildered in the presence of such colossal awfulness. But there is something bigger than skyscraper, dreadnought and gun. Go find it.

Are we sure that man will yet unravel the riddle of life and compass the mysteries involved in a universal social upheaval? Then let us take a look at the Grand Canyon of Arizona. Perhaps we shall feel as did the famous artist who went thither quite confident he could capture the glories of that scene for his canvas. He came away without unpacking his brushes. When asked for an explanation he said, "I dared not insult God."

Do we fear that Christianity, civilization and all the rich heritage of past centuries are lost? We will take our doubts to Kentucky and follow the course of the lost river, so called because no one knows its origin and it vanishes into a cave no one knows whither.

Have we lost Christ and faith in a Kingdom over which he shall reign where'er the sun doth his successive journey run? Follow Peter's "I go a-fishing." Fishing is means of grace—at least so I have found it. A hook, a brook, a shady nook—ah, what medicine for shattered nerves and what rehabilitation for a despoiled life!

As things stand today, there is grave peril for our sanity and institutions unless we let go and let God speak. Let go on nerve tension and thought buckle: let God speak to us. Relax and he will reveal.

Many there are to whom war has brought changes almost as great as those enumerated in Job. Possessions have taken wings, loved ones are gone, health is impaired, friends have not all proved true, religion is no longer the consolation it once was. Nobody understands, apparently nobody cares. All of which proves we are being initiated into the greatest secret society of the world—the Fellowship of Suffering. And we shall never find peace and confidence until we have received the highest degree, kneeling beside our Lord in some garden with his words of self-dedication upon our lips, "Nevertheless not my will but thine be done."

I once heard Dr. F. B. Meyer tell a Northfield audience how, in the greatest intellectual and spiritual crisis of his life, he fled to a wooded hillside overlooking the town where he was pastor, to escape the doubts and fears that hounded him. He was on the verge of insanity. He had written his resignation and resolved to demit the ministry. Think of it—he, one of the greatest spiritual preachers of the age! After hours of pacing to and fro, he found his answer, and with it peace, kneeling in prayer beside a fallen tree.

It is necessity, not literary art, that offers the solution for Job's quandary in rocks and stars, storm and sunshine, whirlwind and whispering waters. In no other fashion could the Almighty be fittingly introduced into the drama. The measure of truth is the measure of the form required for its expression. To Nicodemus's "How can these things be?" Jesus replies in terms of nature. The deduction is that regeneration is too profound for verbal explanation.

THE spiritual truths most needing emphasis at this time are too magnificent for words. Salvation through vicarious suffering, the joy of service, the passion for righteousness, the beauty of human brotherhood, the glory of Jesus Christ, the love of God—what tongue or pen or mind is sufficient for the theme? Where then shall we turn for light and understanding? Where Job turned.

Since nature is good and God is God we may abide in confidence, if we will. Although the leaves fade trees grow. Although there is noise in the branches as they succumb to the elements and rustling among the leaves lying dead upon the ground, the roots continue growing in silence. Death is ostentatious, but life is invisible. No one event exhausts the universe.

It was the close of a perfect spring day. We were leaving behind us Egypt, with its great monuments of a past civilization, and Palestine, with what little is left of the early beginnings of that eternal Kingdom which the Man of Galilee is erecting. Our ship was steaming across the Mediterranean directly toward the golden gate of an exquisite sunset. I stood upon the upper deck just under the officers' bridge, regarding a scene to me as impressive as the prodigality of the Artist invisible who spilled as many colors upon the sea as he spread upon his canvas, the sky. Drawn as by a magnet, passengers and crew were crowded together as far forward as they could get. About me stood first cabin passengers, men of affairs, ladies of fashion, youths of ambition, lovers, and several in deep mourning. On the deck below were the second cabin passengers, while a motley company from almost every quarter of the globe, swarming the steerage deck, put standing-room at a premium. There was little conversation. Upon every deck each was alone with his own thoughts—and with God. It was to me one of those wonderful moments of life. The throb of the machinery, the swish of the waves at the bow, the sunset, the transfixed gazers—I can give you only the faintest conception of the impressiveness of the picture. Standing in that group, there came to mind words inspired by a similar scene, "There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard." God was speaking to all alike.

AGIN it is the close of a day we thought perfect. Humanity is sailing into a sunset more spiritually glorious by reason of the many clouds that with broken wings are flying over our heads into the night behind us. Who doth not feel the spell of the hour? Who hath not had his moments alone with his thoughts? But the gathering twilight is pregnant with a new, a better day. Even now Faith whispers to the soul, "The morning breaketh." So take thy sorrows, doubts, anxieties, dear heart, into his tabernacle this summer and be at rest.

"Can any understand the noise of his tabernacle?" Yes, Elihu, they can, and they do. And, because they understand, men are more and more coming to believe that intelligence, power, order, harmony and love preside over this jarring era, and that some day the sob of the nations will become a new song.

The Winning Spirit

SUNDAY, August 18. Rom. 8:37. "We are more than conquerors in him." This word of the apostle expresses the victorious mood in which victory was achieved. The early believers in the Lord Jesus won the victory in their hearts before they won it on the field. In Christ Jesus they anticipated triumph, and their anticipations made the triumph possible. And this mood is one of the secrets of victory in every Kingdom. Is there any record of an army winning a battle when the soldiers entered the conflict believing they would fail? Such a gloomy lack of confidence would breed a dismal progeny of wants, and the army would be sapped of its vital resources before the battle began. Our biggest inspirations blow from the gates of the morning! Let those gates be closed, and the soul will be deprived of the mystic oxygen which is absolutely essential to her life and strength. There is to me a very real significance, and therefore something of spiritual direction, in the words of the prophet which tell me that the glory of the Lord entered the temple by the gateway "which looked toward the east." He entered by the door which looked toward the new dawns, the new revelations, the door of expectancy and hope! "Lift up your hands, O ye gates, and the King of Glory shall come in!" Our eager confidences become the highway of the Lord.

And so it is that, in a very real degree, we can ascertain the nature of our coming victories or defeats by examining the character of our expectations. We may regard all our unbeliefs as the ministers and precursors of disaster. Whenever did unbelief go into battle singing a song of praise? When did unbelief hammer the strongholds of iniquity with blows which shook its walls into dust? When did unbelief stride out into the second mile with the fine determination to make the second mile the justification of the first? It is only the assurance of victory which works miracles of this kind, and it works them every day. In the spiritual realm a healthy confidence not only sees a highway stretching through coming days, and brightening ever more and more unto perfect day, but it makes that highway the road on which there come the marvelous reinforcements of the spirit, which transform all antagonisms into opportunities of glorious achievements.

And surely this victorious mood is needed today. Our tasks are tremendous. To lose confidence is to lose everything. The devil always wins when he breaks our assurance. To be sure in Christ Jesus is the beginning of victory. Nay, it is victory! "This is the victory which overcometh the world, even our faith."

From Death to Life

MONDAY, August 19. John 5:24. "He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life." These words are in harmony with Jesus' other saying, "I am the way, and the truth, and the life." Christianity has had a singular effect on certain words, greatly intensifying their meaning—such words as "love" and "life." Maeterlinck writes interestingly on "The Life of the Bee," and Fabre on "The Life of the Spider." But do these insects really live? Life is more than existence, more than motion, more than sensation, more than instinct. Life is reason and religion. What does life mean to us at our best? Wordsworth answers, "Admiration, hope and love." Tennyson answers, "Knowledge, reverence, self-control." Both these poets are in accord with the words of Jesus.

Jesus came to fill life with sweet, deep meanings. He came to dignify man in his own sight. So Christianity is a discovery of man's own high destiny. An old Greek philosopher heard somebody say, "It is a bad thing to live," and replied, "It is not bad to live, but it is bad to live badly." Life in the Christian sense is full of knowledge and of activity. "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them." Moreover, life is holiness; that is, health. Health is holiness of the body, the result of obedience to the law. Holiness is health of the soul. So only the holy life can say, "I do always those things that please God." Life on the highest plane is filled with purpose and passion—the purpose to do God's will and the passion to win his approval.

Sealed Unto God

TUESDAY, August 20. II Cor. 1:21, 22. "Now he which establisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God; who hath also sealed us."

These words were written to people who had already become Christians. Their purpose is to remove all doubts as to their final salvation from their hearts and to confirm them in their faith and hope. The apostle tells these people that "he which establisheth us in Christ and hath anointed us, is God." God not only brings men to faith and at their conversion gives them the unction of the Holy Spirit, but he also keeps them in faith and offers them increased assurances of his good-will toward them. The apostle says: "God has sealed us." Elsewhere we are told that the seal is the Holy Spirit himself. It is not some material mark or sign which has been affixed to believers, but a spiritual characteristic that has been stamped into the inner life of believers when they were sealed.

In ancient times the tattooing of the body was a common custom. People would mark their bodies with peculiar signs and characters, in order to show their connection with a certain society or race, Indian warriors went into the fight painted and tattooed. The worshipers at certain pagan shrines in India wear the symbol of their idol branded in their foreheads. Sailors will mark their bodies with the symbol of their ships; friends will paint or scratch each other's names into their skin. Also in marking merchandise the owner or shipper will use a seal. On cattle ranches the stock is branded with a seal. Inventors affix a peculiar device to their work by which they can know and distinguish it. Legal documents, such as wills, deeds, contracts, bonds, etc., are sealed, to certify the validity of the transaction which they import. To any or all of these customs the apostle may allude by way of comparison, when he declares believers sealed with the Holy Ghost. The figure which the apostle employs is a striking one; the thought which it is intended to convey is, that believers belong inseparably to God. To be given this assurance is a great comfort to every child of God amidst the shortcomings, temptations, and dangers of the present life. God has fully secured to himself his own.

His Promises

WEDNESDAY, August 21. John 16:23. "Verily, verily I say unto you, whatsoever ye ask the Father in my name, he will give it you." God and his Word are one; therefore the throne of God rests upon the eternal rock foundations of such promises. What words of hope to a bankrupt sinner! Whatsoever he asks, in Jesus' name and for his sake, the Father will give him! Can it be that all God's riches are at my command? Will he supply all my needs? Shall I never fear or tremble in the face of any danger again? Is it in the Saviour's last will and testament that all he has is mine? Yes, blessed Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, I come to thee that I may receive what is according to thy will and according to thy riches. Thou wilt give me cordial for my pain, cleansing for my sin, comfort for my sorrow, love, joy and peace for my rejoicing. Shall nothing ever separate me from thee? Neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers? Wilt thou hold me safe forever? We know that thou canst not change nor die nor lose thine infinite wealth. What thou hast been in all the past, thou art now to me. Is a thousand years to thee but as a day? Art thou the God of Abraham and my God? The refuge of Jacob and my refuge? Does thy mercy endure forever and for all? Art thou everywhere present to supply every need? O blessed, infinite Father, what wondrous bliss to know that thou, God, seest me, lovest me, blestest me! If I ascend into heaven, thou art there; if I wait upon the earth, thou wilt never leave me. Therefore my home is everywhere, and all things are mine because I am Christ's, and Christ is God's.

The Kingdom of Heaven

THURSDAY, August 22. Matt. 13:33. "The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened." It is a singular thing that Jesus never attempted to define the kingdom of heaven. But again and again, in parables, he describes it by illustration, telling us what it is like. Why did he not define it? Because it is too great to be defined. But he borrows all sorts of figures as symbols of the kingdom. There is no more striking symbol of the kingdom than leaven. It is foreign to the substance which it affects. It is a secret, silent, unobtrusive force. It is pervasive and powerful—so powerful as to change the character of that into which a small quantity of it is introduced.

Christianity is a force entirely alien to the world into which it came. It is not of the earth earthy—not a human religion. God's thoughts are not our thoughts, nor his ways our ways. See the multitude of human gospels—how different these!

Moreover, Christianity is a secret force. It comes without observation. It came into the world with no advertised program, no prospectus. Jesus raised no army, effected no organization. He did not cry aloud in the streets to advertise his wares. It strikes certain minds as exceedingly strange that Christianity did not at the beginning openly attack despotism or slavery; that it made no direct effort to diminish cruelty, to deliver women from bondage and children from barbarous conditions; that it organized no temperance crusade or purity movement. Only immature minds, however, dwell long on these "omissions." The surest way to fail would have been to do exactly what half-baked theories would have demanded. The leaven must first be planted in the meal. That was what Jesus did from the beginning of his ministry to the day when in the attitude of blessing he ascended to the heavens from which he came, thenceforth to give gifts to men. The leaven has been working for eighteen and a half centuries and its power is only beginning to be universally felt. There are still unleavened masses, so there is still work for us to do who were appointed to continue and to complete that which Christ began. Every church at home and every mission abroad, every Christian school and hospital, every evangelist and colporteur is neither more nor less than a purveyor of the leaven of the kingdom. We can do nothing more, though we were the mightiest on earth, and we must do nothing less, whatever the cost may be.

The Trinity

FRIDAY, August 23. II Cor. 13:14. "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen." In this apostolic benediction Paul combines the causes of our salvation. Our salvation is due to the joint operation of the three persons of the holy Trinity: the Father willed it, the Son procured it, the Holy Spirit applies it. Three strands in a cord make the cord all the stronger; so is our salvation made as firm as it can be made by the fact that each person of the Trinity works towards bringing it about. What the entire Godhead is so deeply interested in will surely not fail of the desired end.

Accordingly, we have reason to be grateful to each person of the Godhead for what he has done and is doing to bring about our salvation. We thank the Father that he so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that all who believe in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. We thank the Son, because in him we have the redemption through his blood, namely, the forgiveness of sin; and if any man sin, we have in him an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, who is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world. We thank the Holy Ghost, for when we could not by our own reason or strength believe in Jesus Christ or come to him, the Holy Ghost called us by the Gospel, enlightened us with his gifts, sanctified and kept us in the one true faith, even as he calls, gathers, sanctifies and enlightens the whole Christian Church, and keeps it with Jesus Christ in the one true faith.

False Ease

SATURDAY, August 24. Luke 12:19. "Soul, take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry." Do not most people think, at the beginning of life, "When I have attained my ideal, I shall become perfectly happy?" With one person, it is to be settled in business life; to another, it is to have a home and family; to a third, to secure an education; and all hope to lay up enough of this world's goods for a rainy day. This is the elinax of happiness in this world.

That cruel something, unpossessed,
Crowds and lessens all the rest;
That something, if we could obtain,
Would soon create a future pain.

Christ's presence in the heart is the very vestibule of heaven; it is the joy of the Lord, the peace of the soul. Coming to him, we rest; and whosoever will may come. What wonderful testimonies would the heroes give if we could hear them now! Would not Moses say, "I esteem the reproach of Christ greater than the treasures of Egypt," or Paul, "I suffered the loss of all things that I might win Christ. The light afflictions are not to be compared with the weight of glory." All the hosts of the redeemed rejoice that they exchanged earthly treasures for gems of beauty to bedeck their crown of joy forever.

Spiritual Preparedness

IN recent issues of the Christian Herald, we have referred to the prolific literary product of wartime. To discuss the books that treat of the spiritual aspects of the struggle alone would be a task too large to undertake. Of course, a great many of these books are written by divines; but there are also volumes by statesmen, philosophers, novelists, poets and sociologists, who have found it an irresistible subject for discussion.

But while the conflict of the nations has stirred these intellectual forces into activity, it by no means follows that the world is greatly helped thereby. It would be nearer the truth to state very frankly that the conflict of minds thus far has been confusing rather than convincing. Among the theologians, so many plans have been advanced for setting things right in the world, that the wrangle, taken as a whole, leads nowhere. One authority declares flatly that Christianity is not in crisis and orthodoxy is not in jeopardy. Another holds that a re-statement of vital principles is imperative, and asserts that modern orthodoxy is so littered up with forms, ceremonials and restrictions which have no bearing on real Christian living, that we need to trim the tree of its superfluities that we may have a clear sight of the living branches.

Meanwhile men at the front, according to all the accounts received from innumerable observers, have their own spiritual view and it would seem to be a surprisingly unanimous one. They, at least, have gone deep enough to stand on the fundamentals—the Everlasting Rock. There is no clash of discussion among the men in the trenches, concerning God and the life hereafter, and the world's need of a Saviour. To them has come the revelation that came to Tolstoy, and which has come to many others—that Christ is on the battlefield to comfort and to strengthen every noble purpose and to dignify sacrifice. Will these men, when they return to us, be satisfied with the old forms and limitations? Will they not rather cling to their new and more satisfying vision?

In view of all the conditions, it would seem to be time for the churches, the theologians, clerical and lay, and all good people, to get together. The war, which must end sometime, has intensified the need of a universal recognition of God's sovereignty and righteousness, and of the truth of the Gospel message to man through His revealed Word. That Gospel stands forth more potential than ever.

One of the great leaders of religious thought in America has advanced the view that what is needed in the religious world today is not a re-affirmation of creeds and doctrines, but a New Reformation. What does that imply? If God's people in and out of the churches have the will, and if their will be God's will, and not bounded by narrow individualism, the way will be opened and a leader, strong and courageous, will be found ready. God always has the man for a great emergency.

Sir David Beatty, the admiral of the British fleet, said at a public gathering not very long ago, that if the teachings of Jesus Christ were accepted by the civilized nations, and their course in all things governed accordingly, war would disappear, and the whole world would enter upon a new era. Will the forces of Christianity be ready to welcome such an opportunity? This is the dominant question as we enter the fifth year of the war. What shall be the answer?

The War in Its Fifth Year

THE great world-war has passed into its fifth year, with our own country become one of the chief belligerents, and the only possible terms of peace made clear.

Tremendous changes have come in the last year. President Wilson's definite, inspiring issue has been accepted by all the Allies. Our side has steadily gained in power, materially and morally.

A year ago, the Russian revolution had taken place and the United States had declared war on Germany. Russia's passing out of the war has diverted vast armies against us, but the United States, in preparing men and material for the war and getting them to the battlefield, has far exceeded the most sanguine expectations.

A year ago Italy was preparing to blast the way to Laibach—to Vienna—just as the great Napoleon had done in 1797. She has meanwhile suffered defeat and humiliation, but has emerged with a great moral triumph and is again toiling on the same road; and many believe that this road, just as Napoleon believed and expounded, is the only road.

A year ago, the German U-boat threatened to render nought the vast military preparations of this country. In June, 1917, it disposed of 712,721 gross tons of merchant ships; in June, 1918, its record was only 275,629. Then the tonnage available for the Allies had suffered a net loss of 4,033,368 gross since the war began; now the mighty launching splash of July 4, preceded by augmenting activity in ship-building, both here and in the United Kingdom, has practically reduced that net loss to zero.

A year ago there was cooperation among the Allies, but no unity—aid exchanged, but no common director—now there is "one army, one front, and one supreme command." And one issue. And as the fifth year begins, this vital fact seems to be finding full expression.

Today the Allies have 10,000,000 men facing 6,500,000 Germans in the west. As the fifth year dawned the tide of battle was turning. Increasing advantage is now on our side.

Unparalleled in all history is the mighty sweep of the American army across the Atlantic and into the forefront of the fighting. Unparalleled, too, in all the records of statesmanship, are the principles enunciated by President Wilson for the safety of democracy, for the self-determination of nations, great and small, and for permanent peace through international concert. Washington taught the world to know the meaning of liberty. Wilson is teaching the world to accept that meaning for itself.

Corn for All

THE cornfields of the West and Middle West are one of the battle-grounds on which the war is to be won. The average Easterner has no idea of the meaning of the word cornfield. His conception of a cornfield is based upon the minute patches planted in corn which he has seen in New England, New York or New Jersey.

A glimpse of the cornfields of the West is a revelation of the magnitude of America. In the great corn belt of the West, at this time of the year, the cornfields are an empire in themselves.

This empire, we are told by the Federal Reserve Board's monthly summary, is in a flourishing condition. The bulletins from Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, Minnesota, Kansas and Nebraska range from "good" to "excellent."

More than that, the vast domain in which corn is king has been extended by the timely educational campaign conducted by the Food Administration and the Department of Agriculture. Winter-killed seed corn has been eliminated. Practically all the corn planted germinated well.

Piling Up the Evidence

ANOTHER piece of conclusive evidence, undisclosed for four years, has been brought to light, which conclusively fixes upon the Kaiser and his Junker advisers the responsibility for the world war. With the finger of accusation pointed straight toward him, the Kaiser has proclaimed: "I did not will this war; the blood is not on my hands!" And now the evidence is here to establish the charge.

When the war began, Dr. Wilhelm Mühlson was one of the directors of the Krupp Company. He was in a position to discover that war was pending long before the world knew anything about it. He is now living in Switzerland, safe beyond the reach of the German government, and lately gave out a statement which is virtually a confession. It contains some surprising things. He tells of the guns the Krupps were making for Belgium and which were ready for delivery before the war, but at Belgium's request, were not delivered. "The little kingdom drew all of her war material from Germany," he says, "and depended upon us for models and manufacture. Thus, 28-centimeter guns for fortifying Antwerp had been ordered and were ready for delivery. The earthworks at Antwerp, however, were not sufficiently advanced, and Belgium asked us to keep them, and shortly before the war, even offered to pay storage on the guns if they were kept until it was convenient to accept them. The guns, therefore, were held, and when the war broke, the Prussian War Minister took possession of these valuable cannon and turned them to his own uses." The commandeering of Belgium's cannon and turning them against her was a masterpiece of German efficiency, quite in line with the breaking of treaties, and the violation of Belgian neutrality.

Still another piece of evidence which also convicts Germany of planning and starting the war, is given in a statement by ex-Ambassador Morgenthau. He gives the story of what actually took place at the German war council in Potsdam July 5, 1914, as it was related to him by Baron Wangenheim, then German Ambassador to Constantinople, and it corroborates the disclosures made by Prince Liehnowsky, an account of which the Christian Herald gave in a former issue. Baron Wangenheim told him, after war had been declared, the facts of the Potsdam meeting. Kaiser Wilhelm, Moltke, the Army Chief of Staff, Admiral von Tirpitz and a number of leading bankers, railroad directors, and managers of large industries were present.

Wangenheim now told me that the Kaiser solemnly put the question to each man in turn: Was he ready for war? All replied "Yes," except the financiers. They said that they must have two weeks to sell their foreign securities and to make loans. It was decided to give the bankers time to readjust their finances for the coming war, and then the several members went quietly back to their work or started on vacations.

In telling me about this conference, Wangenheim, of course, admitted that Germany had precipitated the war. I think that he was rather proud of the whole performance; proud that Germany had gone about the matter in so methodical and far-seeing a way; especially proud that he himself had been invited to participate in so momentous a gathering. The several blue, red, and yellow books which flooded Europe the few months following the outbreak, and the hundreds of documents which were issued by German propaganda attempting to establish Germany's innocence, never made any impression on me. For my conclusions as to the responsibility are not based on suspicions or belief or the study of circumstantial data. I do not have to reason or argue about the matter. I know. Whenever I hear people arguing about the responsibility for this war, or read the clumsy and lying excuses put forth by Germany, I simply recall the burly figure of Wangenheim as he appeared that August afternoon, puffing away at a huge black cigar and giving me his account of this historic meeting.

Can any one who reads such a revelation doubt that the unbiased historians of the great war will hold the Potsdam Conference as the pivotal point upon which rests the whole question of responsibility for its beginning? That meeting, under the Kaiser's prompting, gave the decision he desired. And, as ex-Ambassador Morgenthau adds, in the two weeks' interval the bankers completed their plans. These were historic weeks in the exchanges of Europe and America. Germany changed her securities into cash for war purposes. There was a huge slump in quotations—but the thing was done, and the Kaiser proceeded to turn loose upon the world the destructive forces he had been organizing for many years—an act which he now, with hands uplifted to heaven, repudiates with a vehemence that is both tragical and pitiful.

That this repudiation is itself repudiated by the same and just element among the German people, is made evident in the recent petition of Captain Von Beerfelde to the Reichstag, to "prosecute relentlessly" the leaders of Germany in 1914 as men who "were guilty of the most criminal savagery and the most abominable swindle, and they are traitors and criminals." He especially indicates Chancellor Bethmann von Holweg, although he might have gone higher, as the Chancellor was merely the appointed mouth-piece of his Hohenzollern masters. Bold and startling as is the arraignment, and one that is very likely to cost its author his liberty, it cannot be otherwise regarded than as an indication of what is passing in the minds of many Germans at the present time.

Old Clothes During the War

"NO new dresses" is the slogan raised by members of the National Women's Liberty Loan Committee, in conference at Chicago to devise means for increasing women's activities in the next war bond campaign. The economy is urged with the idea of making thrift fashionable for the period of the war. But, in fact, as respects all woolen fabrics, wearing old clothes, voluntary now, may soon be made compulsory in view of the military requirements for wool. Men in particular, apart from the cost of new clothes, are likely to find it expedient to make their old suits serve as long as possible.

The dyers and cleaners of the country, in convention at Atlantic City, showed themselves alive to the situation. They have taken advantage of the opportunity to have their industry recognized by the government as essential to the winning of the war and are about to begin a publicity campaign to educate the public to the possibilities of reclaiming old clothing through modern processes of cleaning and dyeing.

Meantime the government itself is setting an excellent example. At the repair shops and cleaning plants established by the Quartermaster Corps at the army cantonments 907,466 pieces of wearing apparel were repaired and 405,102 pieces dry-cleaned in May, and the issue of new clothing materially reduced. Certainly if the government can afford to save old clothes the public can. There is no reproach in an old coat nowadays if it is a clean coat; it may even serve in the circumstances as a uniform of patriotism.

About His Master's Business

MARGARET JAKUES writes these facts of a man who was about his Master's business: During the past twenty years Dr. William H. Schureman, Presbyterian Sabbath school missionary, has traveled across the arid plains and through the mountainous districts of Wyoming and northern Colorado, bringing new life and a future to settlements where dance halls and saloons were predominant, where absolute ignorance reigned, where not only the children but a second and third generation were growing up without any religious influence in their lives, and where mail-order catalogues were their only Bibles. Most of the 254,000 miles traveled in visiting the ranchers, homesteaders and poor whites living in dugouts, sod houses and huts of one, two and three rooms, were covered behind a horse which never exceeded four miles an hour. In his buggy Dr. Schureman carried a tent, a folding organ which he found invaluable in conducting services, a bread-box containing food and cooking utensils and feed for his horse. At night he pitched camp in that desolate country where the wolves and coyotes howled, and went on the next day to the end of his destination. At other times he traveled by foot, stagecoach or train. Recently he has covered his territory in an automobile, driving over 8,000 miles the first season, and carrying his sleeping and eating paraphernalia with him. During his twenty years of service, Dr. Schureman has assisted at over 45,000 meetings, established many Sunday schools and churches, helped secure ministers and start schools, and has taken part in the construction of some of the church buildings. From those meager beginnings which he has helped these people make, churches are being built, vice is slowly being wiped out, and the bigger things along religious lines which make life more tolerable for the people who are struggling to build for themselves and their children a future home, are being commenced. The work of the pioneer minister is all important. There has to be the beginning of things in the building of a home, the founding of a church. Such beginnings necessarily involve hard work and personal sacrifice. Our country has been peculiarly blessed with the character of these pioneer home missionaries. As much to them as to the ministers who follow them in the fine churches and cultivated communities, is due the great success of the Church in this country. These pioneers imitate the great early missionary who said: "We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord, and ourselves your servants for Jesus sake." (11 Cor. 4:5.)

Dog Stops Men Fighting

THREE men in Brooklyn, neighbors and friends, were sent to St. Catherine's Hospital the other day suffering with dog bites, and were attended by the surgeon. The men were sitting in the backyard of the residence of one of them and got into an argument which turned into a free-for-all fight. The dog of one of the men, who was lying asleep, said to himself: "Is not this a pretty picture? Men have no right to make brutes of themselves; much less friends who have no reason for a difference. But since they really want to fight so badly, I will teach them how to do the trick." And so he rushed in and began to bite them terribly, not sparing his master. Stung with the pain, they turned from knocking each other to fight the dog; but he was too much for them, and cleaned out the crowd. Completely vanquished, the men made a break for a high fence and climbed upon that, but the dog chewed the calves of their legs till they pulled themselves up out of his reach atop of the fence. The dog then went back to his corner as though saying to himself: "Now I guess they are cured. It will be a good while before they will disturb the peace of this neighborhood again, or disgrace my backyard." And they were cured, sure enough. All the fight was gnawed out of them. They did not want to fight

The apostle makes reference to the beast-and-angel conflict in us in these words: "But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another. Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh." (Gal. 5:15-16.)

Paris Bird-Charmer Dead

HENRI POL, the famous old bird-charmer of the Tulleries Gardens in Paris, died recently. Every afternoon for the last forty years this veteran pensioned postal official attracted large a beautiful example we have here of human tenderness and affection for the lower tribes! There is the story of a nation in olden time which set out to find a king to rule them. One of the stipulations was that the one to be selected should be a kind-hearted man. They found a man so kind in spirit that the wild beasts fell in love with him. The lions, tigers, panthers and other wild animals came to his hut in the woods every day and he fed them out of his hands, and petted them as his children. Those searching for the king said, "Here we have him. One so kind to the dumb creatures will be good to men, and one who can so tame the beasts will be able to control the passions of the people." The old bird-charmer of Paris copied God in his love and care for every creature he has made. Christ thus refers to the divine love for the birds: "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? And one of them shall not fall without your Father." (Matt. 10:29.)

Cripple Rescues Boy

AS a score of able-bodied men looked on, John Sherlock, fifteen, of Newark, N. J., a cripple, jumped into the Morris Canal, and after a hard struggle saved Julius Friedman, fifteen, from drowning. Friedman had gone down once before Sherlock, walking half a block away, heard his screams. A dozen boys and twice as many men on the bridge watched the boy going down the second time. Sherlock ran to the canal dragging the leg that had been paralyzed since he was an infant. Without removing even his cap, he plunged in and swam to the other lad. He caught the boy as he was sinking and, after a struggle that almost exhausted him, got him to the bank, where both were pulled out. The rescued boy was unconscious, and the rescuer collapsed and had to be taken to the hospital. Such acts of heroism dignify human life, and the courage and heroism of the poor little cripple shames the cowardice and selfishness of those of us who are unwilling to do anything of much account for the physical or moral welfare of others. How like the spirit of the Master this crippled boy of fifteen, who forgot his own life in his supreme passion to save another! "He that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." (Matt. 10:39.)

Hunger Stone in Elbe

THE famous "hunger stone" in the River Elbe near Tetschen, which according to popular belief in Germany predicts a famine when seen, is now visible for the first time since the beginning of the war. The stone lies in the bed of the Elbe River, and has never been visible save at exceptionally low tide. On the stone is chiseled in old German, "When ye see me, ye will weep." It indicates low water for want of rain, and consequently scant crops. In olden times the Nile overflowed its banks once every year, and covered the land with the fertilizing mud so indispensable to the crops of Egypt. The ingenious Egyptian mind invented the Nilometer to indicate the stage of the water. When it marked high in the scale the people rejoiced, and when it marked low the people were stricken with terror at the prophecy of crop failure. That is the scientific thought in the "hunger stone" of the Elbe. The hiding or the appearance of the "hunger stone" suggests the divine arrangement in these words: "Thou didst cleave the fountain and the flood: thou driedst up mighty rivers." (Ps. 74:15.)

Japan's Debt to Whaler

A STORY stranger than fiction has recently become the basis of an international event in the presentation by a distinguished physician of Tokyo of a historic Samurai sword several thousand years old to the village of Fairhaven, Mass. This is the story in briefest form: About 1841, Captain W. H. Whitfield took his little sailing-vessel out of the harbor of New Bedford and Fairhaven in search of whales. During his long cruise he rescued a group of shipwrecked Japanese fishermen on a barren island in the Pacific. Among them was a singularly bright boy of fourteen. The captain took this boy home with him, made him a member of his own family, sent him to school with his own children, and taught him by precept and example the Christian religion. The boy became a prodigy as a student, and mastered navigation. Homesick, he started back to see his mother. He landed in disguise, but was seized and thrown into prison and feared, such was their custom of exclusiveness, that he would be killed; but he was so brilliant, so well educated, and knew America so well, that the authorities spared him. When Perry's guns waked up Japan, they sent for this fisher lad, whose name was Manjiro Nakahama, to tell them about America and its ships, and he became a confidant of the throne and held one office of honor after another, and is recognized as one of the founders of the New Japan. Recently his son presented the sword to the village of Fairhaven in recognition of the rescue of his father by Captain Whitfield, and Viscount Ishii, Japanese ambassador to the United States, was commissioned by his government to deliver it to the village through the hand of Captain Whitfield's grandson as an acknowledgment of what had been done for Japanese civilization. The ambassador said: "The port of New Bedford and Fairhaven is the cradle of modern Japanese civilization, and in this sense the Japanese nation feels grateful over this historical incident." He then pledged Japan's eternal friendship to the United States. Captain Whitfield, who was a very devout man, always held that his relation to the Japanese waif, who had so much to do in ruling the world, was no accident, but a part of the plan of Providence to save this world for Christ. Of the captain, of the Japanese statesman, of the whaling village, and of the United States it can be said: "Ye are the light of the world." (Matt. 5:14.)

CZECHS TAKE ANOTHER TOWN. The Czecho-Slovak troops on August 1 were in control of Yekaterinburg in the Urals, where the former Czar was executed. Both the Bolsheviks and Germans were reported as greatly worried over the rising power of the Czechs and the Social Democrats. The Germans were reported to be organizing a force of Finnish, Russian and German troops to begin a campaign against the Allied forces on the Murman coast.

Acting Secretary of State Polk announced on August 3 that the plan for intervention in Russia had been completed and that the United States and Japan would send a force of a "few thousand men" to Vladivostok to occupy that port and support the Czecho-Slovaks as they advance westward in Siberia. The United States would also continue to co-operate with England and France in the occupation of the Murmansk coast of European Russia. Formal assurance is to be given that there is no intention to interfere with the sovereignty of Russia or to impair her territorial integrity and the United States is to send to Siberia a commission of merchants, agricultural experts, labor advisers, Red Cross representatives and agents of the Y. M. C. A. to relieve the economic needs of the Russian people and to render other aid as opportunity offers. On August 3 a revolution in Archangel wrested that port from the Bolsheviks. The Soviet troops fled and Allied troops were landed. American Ambassador Francis and the other Allied missions have moved from Volagda to Murmansk.

FOR A DEPARTMENT OF AERONAUTICS. Senator Harry New of Indiana on August 1 introduced in the Senate a bill providing for a Secretary of Aeronautics to be a member of the President's Cabinet and to have complete supervision and control over all the aircraft activity of the nation.

THE GREATEST MUNICIPAL RAILWAY. New York City on August 1 put into operation the new dual subway system consisting of two north and south lines in Manhattan each with two branches in upper Manhattan and the Bronx, with connections leading to Brooklyn and Queens and crosstown lines connecting the trunk lines in Manhattan. Some elements of the system are still to be completed. When completed, the subways will operate 600 track miles of underground and elevated railway which will have cost over $400,000,000.

THE LONGER THE FIGHT THE HARDER THE TERMS. Premier Lloyd-George addressing a committee of manufacturers on August 1 reaffirmed the necessity for an economic league of nations after the war. He said that America had not yet concurred in the plans for the perpetuation of the battle alliance of the present in an economic league to follow the war, but he said that the nations of the Entente must retain control after the war over certain elements of raw materials and transportation, and he declared that "The longer the war lasts the sterner must be the economic terms we impose on the foe. I think the sooner he realizes that the better."

EIGHTEEN TO FORTY-FIVE. The War Department let it be known on August 1 that it had completed the bill for the revision of the draft law. The department is planning the organization of six war divisions each month beginning with August, 1918, which would mean about 300,000 men a month for France. The total in France or in the way, on August 2, was 1,300,000 men. The draft ages provided for in the man power bill were made public on August 3, as 18 to 45. It is estimated that with all the men within these ages to draw from it will be possible to maintain an army of from 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 in France with an equal number in training at home. It was hoped to hold the registration under the bill on September 5.

NATIONAL CITY BANK DEFENDS PACKERS. The National City Bank of New York recently called attention to the fact that the Federal Trade Commission in stating that the profits of Armour & Co. in 1917 were 16.8 per cent, failed to state that this was figured against the invested capital of $156,000,000, whereas Armour's were using $133,404,000 of borrowed capital padski. He fixed ruinous prices for Ukrainian grain in order to lower the cost to Germany and recently arrested two former members of the legal government for plotting to restore it.

HARVESTER TRUST TO DISSOLVE. By agreement between the government and the International Harvester Co. the company will withdraw its appeal from cent. tax is proposed on sales of Stock Exchange seats and 20 per cent. on dues and fees. A new tax would take 1 per cent. from mail-order houses with an annual business of over $100,000. The capital stock of all corporations and associations would pay $1 on each $1,000. Dues and fees of societies not charitable or religious would be taxed 20 per cent.

Cigars will pay a tax of $2 to $30 per 1,000, depending on price; cigarettes, $5 to $10; tobacco, 30 cents per pound; cigarette papers and tubes, 1 to 4 cents per package; theaters, music halls and circuses would pay $50 to $100; motor cars, $10 to $500 a year; gasoline, 2 cents a gallon; motorcycles, $5 a year; private yachts, 10 per cent on price.

LYDD GEORGE CALLS "HOLD FAST." The Premier issued to the British nation, on August 4, the following message:

The message which I send to the people of the British Empire on the fourth anniversary of their entry into the war is: "Hold Fast!" I say "Hold fast!" because our prospects of victory have never been so bright as they are today.

Thanks to the invincible bravery of all the Allied armies, it is now evident to all that this dream of universal conquest, for the sake of which Germany wantonly prolonged the war, can never be fulfilled.

But the battle is not yet won. The great autocracy of Prussia will still endeavor, by violence or guile, to avoid defeat, and so give militarism a new lease of life.

We cannot seek to escape the horrors of war for ourselves by laying them up for our children. Having set our hands to the task, we must see it through till a just and lasting settlement is achieved.

In no other way can we insure a world set free from war.

HOLD FAST!

LYDD GEORGE.

PRESIDENT URGES VOTES FOR WOMEN. President Wilson on July 26 and 30 wrote to Senator Shields of Tennessee urging him to vote for the Woman Suffrage resolution which will be before the Senate when it reconvenes. Senator Shields has opposed the amendment. The President also on July 31 wrote to Senator Baird of New Jersey, Republican, a new Senator who had not yet declared himself. The President based his appeal on his belief that "Our present position as champions of democracy throughout the world would be greatly strengthened if the Senate would follow the example of the House in passing the pending amendment."

TYRANT OF UKRAINE DIES BY BOMB. General Field Marshal von Eichhorn, German commander in the Ukraine, with his adjutant, was killed on July 30 at Kiev by a bomb thrown into the carriage by a Social Revolutionist. ARMORERS are working in the Metropolitan Museum in New York to develop from the steel suits of knightly days a metal covering for the troops of today. Forges flame and anvils ring with the clang of hammers skilfully swung. All this makes even clearer the need of the Christian for the whole armor which Dr. Jowett portrays next week. Next week also we will see through the eye of a witness the days of suffering and of longing and the days of joy and relief that marked the last tenure of the Turk on Jerusalem and the change to British hands. The story is here told for the first time.

their machine-guns in utter disregard of anti-aircraft batteries and automatic rifles and they made a lot of trouble. But they didn't all get home again. One followed an observation balloon down, finally setting it on fire as it reached the ground, but the aviator was struck squarely by a three-inch shell. The machine had sixty-three holes in it. The American and French aviator did not let the Germans go unseathed. Regardless of numbers they kept after the enemy, bringing them down by ones and twos, while they also kept his own lines under constant attack and observation.

AFTER a day of heavy work by the Allied artillery of all calibers, which took under their fire German barbed-wire systems located by the airmen, the Allied troops on Thursday, August 1, again pressed forward. Northwest of Fère-en-Tardenois the French and Scottish troops pressed the Germans back for from 1½ to 2 miles along a ten-mile front, reaching hill 205 northeast of Grand Rozoy along the road to Braisne. Americans operating out of Sergy flanked the Germans out of Cierges to the southeast and out of all but the northern fringe of the Meunière Wood.

The French co-operated on the American flank in this operation and further east French and British troops advanced southwest of Ville-en-Tardenois and repulsed a German attack in Bligny southwest of Rheims. The day's operations netted over 700 prisoners. The Allied captures of prisoners from July 15 to 31 were officially given as 33,400.

AUGUST 4, the fourth anniversary of Britain's entry into the war, was a day of victory for the Allied arms. The sunset of this day saw every German soldier back over the River Vesle between Soissons and Rheims, and Allied troops north of the Vesle in position to flank the enemy and to force him back to the Aisne, perhaps to the Chemin des Dames.

On Thursday night the army of General Mangin drove the Germans from the heights about Hartennes, five miles south of Soissons, and swept down the Mountain of Paris to the suburbs of Soissons, while the army of General de Goutte, including the American divisions, drove the enemy northward from the woods of Meunière, and the army of General Berthelot, including British divisions, encompassed and passed Ville-en-Tardenois. These advances completely uncovered the German defense line south of Vesle. There was only one thing to do, and the Crown Prince did it. The German troops were set to the retreat. Taking such of their guns and material as they could, they set on fire what could not be taken away and bent their force almost wholly to the retreat, leaving few rear-guards and depending upon the almost incessant rains to delay the Allied advance. Bad as the roads were under the pouring rains, the French cavalry kept close to the heels of the retreating enemy, and the French, British and American advance-guards seldom lost sight of the waves of field gray sweeping northward. Now and then a few machine-gunners were left to delay the Allied advance, but on the whole the work of Friday and Saturday was mostly marching with little fighting, until the Vesle River was reached.

The French pressed forward down the ravine of the Crise, east of Soissons, the Americans advanced along the valley of the Orillon toward Fismes, and the British and Italians followed the River Ardre also toward Fismes, sweeping man losses in killed were tremendous, while the captures are reported to be such as "will thrill the world." More than sixty villages were recaptured in two days' fighting, August 3-4. German machine-guns were found in the woods captured by the Americans, with their entire crews dead of bullet and bayonet wounds, while before them lay some boys in khaki whose comrades had ment the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor.

General Ludendorff was quoted in a message through Amsterdam, on August 4, as saying in regard to the retrograde advance on the Marne:

"The enemy evaded us on July 15, and we thereupon, as early as the evening of the 16th, broke off operations. It is always our endeavor to stop an undertaking as soon as the stake is not worth the cost. I consider it one of my principal duties to spare the blood and strength of our soldiers. We figured with an attack on July 18 and were prepared for it. The enemy experienced very heavy losses, and the Americans and African auxiliary troops, which we do not underestimate, suffered severely. By the afternoon of the 19th we already were fully masters of the situation and shall remain so. We left the abandoned ground to the enemy according to our regular plan. 'Gain of ground' and 'Marne' are only catchwords without importance for the issue of the war. We are now, as before, confident."

AUGUST 5 saw a very little change in the battle situation. The Germans were cleared from the south bank of the Vesle and French and American patrols were engaging enemy patrols at several places on the north bank where Allied troops had established bridgeheads. The Americans, after a seven hours' fight on August 4 with the Prussian Guard for possession of Fismes, forced a crossing of the Vesle under heavy artillery fire, a body of 25 engineers finally completing a bridge after their ranks had been reduced to 5 and the bridge had been several times destroyed. The river here was 50 feet wide and from 5 to 8 feet deep.

The losses of the Germans in the fighting since July 15 are estimated at not less than 350,000 men. They lost few big guns but many 77 field guns and trench mortars. General Mangin's army alone took 500 guns and as many trench mortars, while over 1,500,000 77-millimeter shells were captured.

The War Department at Washington made public, on August 5, the first report of casualties from the Marne fighting. The list contained 716 names of which 459 represented men killed in action, while 80 had died of wounds.

A German submarine on the night of August 4 torpedoed in the English Channel the British hospital ship Warilda, loaded with 800 stretcher cases, badly wounded men. The ship did not sink immediately, and destroyers saved all but 123 of her passengers and crew.

WHILE withdrawing from the Marne salient, the Germans also withdrew across the Aisne south of Albert, giving up a strip five miles long by a third of a mile deep, which was at once occupied by the British, while north of Montdidier along a front of about ten miles they withdrew to the western side of the Avre. On the 5th they withdrew their lines northwest of La Bassee. This, coupled with other recent withdrawals, created an impression that they were less well supplied with effective troops than had been supposed and were shortening their lines to create an army of maneuver either for a future offensive or to resist Allied pressure.

The steady tread of the men in khaki heartens the people of France. These boys are marching through Paris northward from the Ardre toward the Vesle. The same rains which had delayed the Allied pursuit had put the little Vesle in flood, and as the Allies approached the stream they got into action again with the German rear-guards. Few prisoners were taken. By evening of August 3, the Allies held firmly the whole line of the Aisne to the junction of the Vesle and the south side of the Vesle as far as the suburbs of Fismes. Between Fismes and Rheims the Germans were holding tenaciously to a narrow strip south of the Vesle. On Sunday morning the Americans took Fismes by storm, and August 4 closed with the Germans all driven across the Vesle and the Allies over the stream northwest of Rheims, where they took La Neuville, and also over the Aisne east of Soissons. The German heavy artillery was in position on the heights north of the Vesle, shells from 210-millimeter guns falling in the Allied positions south of the stream, while all crossings of the river were made in the face of desperate resistance. While it did not seem likely that the Germans would be able to remain south of the Aisne, it was apparent that they planned to hold their positions as long as possible.

General Pershing on August 4 reported, "The full fruits of victory in the counter-offensive begun so gloriously by Franco-American troops on July 18 were reaped today when the enemy, who met his second great defeat on the Marne, was driven in confusion beyond the line of the Vesle. The enemy, in spite of suffering the severest losses, has proved incapable of stemming the onslaught of our troops, fighting for liberty side by side with French, British and Italian veterans. In the course of the operations, 8,400 men and 133 guns have been captured by our men alone."

While no reports have been made of general captures since the 1st of August the correspondents agree that the Gergone on to share the victory. Trenches were filled with German dead; the ground was littered with them; groups piled up along the roadside showed where Allied bombing-planes or long range shells had caught a retreating column. Everywhere the ground was strewn with the wreckage of the German army. Large masses of supplies were not destroyed, fires set to destroy them being extinguished by the rains; but the Germans had made a systematic attempt to destroy not only their own supplies, but buildings of all kinds, and even the standing crops of rye and wheat, ripened and ready to cut.

The fight for Meunière Wood, which was taken by the 32nd Division of National Guard troops from Wisconsin and Michigan, 250 of whom were lost in the Tuseania, is thus described by Edwin L. James, New York Times correspondent with the American troops:

"On July 31 we charged six times against the German positions at the southern end of the woods, and six times were beaten back. The force making the attack was composed of lumberjacks, farmer boys and Indians. Early on the morning of August 1, after artillery preparation, the boys from Michigan and Wisconsin went into the fray again. Their yells could be heard a mile away. They were up against two of the Kaiser's redoubtable divisions, the 200th Jaegers and the 216th Reserve Division. They fought with vim and joy. The men from the Great Lakes region accomplished what they set out to do. They got their revenge for the sinking of the Tuseania."

News of the great retreat of the Germans was learned by the Allied troops as they swept on through the numerous recaptured villages. At different points the villagers declared that thousands of the Kaiser's troops were marching northward, chanting as they marched: "Back, back to Germany!"

Mary, Mary Stay-at-Home

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

SHE sat on the front porch of the boarding-house and knitted, her slim little hands fairly seeming to fly, and her small wistful face bent broodingly above the gray ball of yarn and the glittering steel needles that she held. One, watching her, would have noticed the hands and the face long before he noticed the foot in its cruel brace and the two mocking crutches that leaned beside her armchair. For the face was such a very intent face and the hands were such busy hands!

She knitted until the gray yarn began to take shape under the magic of her fingers, and then, suddenly, she laid it down with a little sharp sigh, and rested her head back against her chair, and looked soberly down the village street where the nearby country trees marched, like a green, even row of soldiers, along either side of the pavement.

"It seems so useless to be sitting here," she told herself—and though her voice was soft, there was a certain heartache in the tone of it—"to be sitting here, just knitting, and being—safe—while there's so much real work to be done!" And the eyes that were glancing down the village street misted over with tears.

SHE had been planning to go to France, had Mary Talbot, a year ago. "For," she had said, "I haven't any family here, or any home to leave. And I'm past my youth, so I'll be able to mother the boys that most need it—and to comfort them. There are a good many reasons why most women and girls can't go—they have people and other ties—but I'm alone. And I've a certain income, and—and, anyway, I feel that my place is somewhere Over There."

So she had been planning to go to France—planning with her trunk nearly packed and her ticket almost bought. And the town people who knew her as a little old maid who was "well fixed" began to regard her as a new Joan of Arc. And she went around with a smile on her lips and a light in her wistful eyes, until—

IT was an innocuous-looking little rag rug that she slipped on, but it lay at the top of the boarding-house stairs, and they were steep stairs. And Mary Talbot falling heavily down the steep stairs, had scarcely had time to scream.

They had picked her up, a few minutes later, from the hall floor—a white-faced, blue-lipped wraith of a woman, with a foot that lay out in front of her seriously distorted and twisted. They had carried her, trying hard not to groan up to her bed. And they had called the doctor. . . . And dreams of going to France had merged into nightmares of exquisite pain. And then there had been only the brace, and the pain of crutches, and the knitting to be done, safely, on a boarding-house porch. One can scarcely blame Mary Talbot, whose soul had seen visions, for sighing as she stared down the quiet village street!

There was a rustle on the front steps, and the Visiting Lady from the city paused beside Mary Talbot's chair. The Visiting Lady from the city brought a new conception of silks and laces to the little village, a new point of view and a new sort of laughter.

"Well, how's the little knitting person today?" She inquired. "Seems as if she's always knitting!"

"Yes," Mary Talbot answered in her soft, gentle voice, "yes, I do knit most of the time. It's a pair of socks that I'm making now, for a soldier."

"Oh!" The Visiting Lady's voice held a note of very real interest. "Oh! Some one that belongs to you?"

Mary Talbot's hand was not quite steady as she touched the ball of gray yarn. "I had hoped," she told the Visiting Lady, "to sail for France this year. But my plans didn't go through quite as I had planned. I wanted to go over and help those boys who are away from home. But now that I'm"—she smiled bravely—"a cripple, all that I can do is just make socks. No, they're not for any one that belongs to me—they're just for whoever needs them. War time, I think, is a time when everybody's kin to everybody else. And so I knit four pairs of socks a week, and it seems very little to do!"

The Visiting Lady from the city was staring curiously at her own jeweled hands. They were pretty, useless hands.

"I never knitted a pair of socks yet," she said finally. "I wonder if I could learn."

Mary Talbot's face brightened. "I'd be right glad to teach you. You see, the boys need them—badly."

Suddenly the Visiting Lady was brushing her hand across her eyes.

"Oh, I'll learn"—she said. "You see, I hadn't thought much about socks." And then, all at once, she bent down to kiss the wistful upturned face of Mary Talbot. "You're such a brave little thing!" she exclaimed. And the silk of her dress rustled in through the door of the boarding-house.

MARY TALBOT took up the beginning of the sock that she was working upon. There was a smile, faintly embarrassed, upon her face, and a look, faintly puzzled, in her eyes. She began to knit again. It was the housekeeper, pausing by the boarding-house gate, who interrupted her.

"Oh, Mary Talbot!" called the Housekeeper shrilly, "what do you think!"

The woman on the porch again raised her eyes from her knitting—and she smiled as they rested upon the flushed face of the Housekeeper.

"I think," she answered, "that something's been bothering you. Yes?"

The Housekeeper came heavily up the walk and stood, aggressively, on the porch steps, a bit below the level of Mary Talbot's eyes.

"What do you think?" she began again, half-accusingly. "The grocer refuses to give me the wheat flour I need—and I've cakes and pies and bread to make today! The grocer says that the government is using all of the wheat flour for our boys—that they need it. 'Well,' I asked him, 'we've got to eat, too, haven't we!' and he said, 'Not wheat flour! I sha'n't deal with him any more!' And the Housekeeper paused—perhaps for breath.

Mary Talbot's gentle little face was vaguely troubled, and the knitting dropped from her forgetful fingers.

"But, my dear," she remonstrated, "he's quite right—the grocer. We must give up these tiny things. After all, cakes and pies should mean very little to us—very little indeed—as long as our boys have bread to eat!"

"It's easy," the Housekeeper was protesting. "It's very easy for you to talk. You never kept house—you never made cakes and pies—you don't have to do it now. It's easy for you to get along without flour."

Mary Talbot interrupted. Her soft little voice was rather firm.

"Dear lady," she said, "I wanted to go to France to help those boys who are fighting in a strange land. But God willed that I shouldn't go. And so I haven't any chance at all to help. All I can do is to sit here and—knit."

"But you—you can help. You can help the boys—you can let them have enough to eat—by doing as your grocer, and your government, says—by conserving flour, and sugar, and other things. You've a chance, just as every other housekeeper has a chance, to help your country win the war. I envy you!"

The Housekeeper had flushed. But she looked straight into the wistful eyes of Mary Talbot.

"I hadn't," she admitted, "looked at things in just that light before. I'm afraid that I've been very selfish. I fancy"—her voice was brusque—that we can eat corn bread and graham muffins as well as the next one. I"—the voice now held a note of pride—"I make very good corn bread and graham muffins!"

THERE was a moment of silence, and in that moment Mary Talbot had begun again to work on the woolen sock. The Housekeeper turned away. But—

"Thank you, Mary Talbot," she called back over her shoulder. "You've helped—how you've helped!"

And the faintly puzzled expression grew in the eyes of the woman on the boarding-house porch.

It was perhaps ten minutes later that the Old Minister came up the path. He was a tired old minister, but he laughed as he looked into the face of Mary Talbot.

"I never," he told her, "saw such a lazy woman! Your hands are always so still"—he laughed again. "Honestly, Mary," he questioned, "do you knit while you're asleep?"

Mary Talbot joined in the laugh.

"Indeed I don't," she told him, "It's very little knitting that I can do, Mr. Barker. If I were over in France, now, I might be able to help! But here—four pairs of socks a week isn't much, Mr. Barker!"

The old Minister had dropped down beside her on the porch step. The laughter had died out of his face.

"In France," he repeated musingly. And then—"My boy's going, Mary. He's over age a lot, and he's my only one. But he's going today!"

Across the face of Mary Talbot there swept a flame-like glow.

"Oh, Mr. Barker!" she thrilled; "how perfectly glorious! How wonderful to know that a part of you—of you—is going to do something in this great conflict! How proud you must be!"

THE Old Minister reached out and touched the gray ball of yarn in her lap. His hand trembled.

"Mary," he said after a moment, "I'm not as proud as I want to be. I'm almost afraid! I've prayed to the Father, but—and it's the first time in my life—my faith isn't strong enough. I'm afraid to have him go!"

Mary Talbot looked at her pastor. He was old enough to be her father, and he had been a bulwark of strength to her through all of her life. Suddenly she found herself remembering how, when her mother had been lying dead in the darkened guest-room, he had taken her—a small sobbing girl—into his arms and explained to her the eternal mystery of life and death.

"Mr. Barker," she said softly, "it's just shock that's making you feel so. Of course your faith is strong enough! And your pride—why?"—a sudden deep note crept into her voice—"why, I'd give half of my heart and soul if I had some one to send! You can't realize how awful it is to know that your part is the biggest thing on earth is just to do nothing but sit alone on a porch—and knit. I'd be the washwoman, who's sent a son, if I could! I'd be little Mrs. Smith, who is taking in sewing so that her husband can go, if I might! Even the pain of parting, and the agony of waiting, aren't anything to the pride of owning some one who is there!"

The Old Minister was looking deep into the soul of Mary Talbot—deep into the soul that shone out through her wistful eyes. Perhaps he, too, was remembering the little alone-in-the-world girl who had clung to him sobbingly. And then, without a word, he pressed her hand and walked off down the path. But his head was high.

Mary Talbot bent her eyes—tear-misted, and worked steadily until there came a hail from the gate. She glanced up quickly and saw the Very Dear Friend leaning against the white post of it.

"Well! 'Mary, Mary quite contrary!' called the Very Dear Friend, 'How does your garden grow!'"

Mary Talbot, chained to her porch chair, was seeing war-torn fields of France—fields that were calling to her—as she answered.

"I reckon," she said, "that it's Mary, Mary stay at home! And I'm afraid that there isn't any garden. . . ."

PROFESSOR WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH, a native of Rochester, N. Y., known throughout the United States as an author and lecturer, died on Thursday afternoon, July 25, 1918, shortly after 4 o'clock at the Hahnemann Hospital, Rochester, N. Y. For many years he was a teacher in Rochester Theological Seminary. Last March on account of ill health he gave up teaching. He was born October 4, 1861, and came of a long line of ministers and university graduates. He first came into public notice as a writer in 1907 through the publication of "Christianity and the Social Crisis" which immediately achieved a remarkable success. It appeared when Roosevelt was President, and when men like Ray Stannard Baker and Lincoln Steffens were writing on social conditions. John

A Famous Author Passes Away

Haynes Holmes said of it four years later "In the field of the Church and the social question one book is supreme, namely, 'Christianity and the Social Crisis,' by Professor Walter Rauschenbusch. Into this book has gone the learning of the scholar, the vision of the poet and the passion of the prophet."

In a "Guide of Reading in Social Ethics," compiled by Harvard professors in 1910, "Christianity and the Social Crisis" was the only book starred in the literature on "Religion and the Social Question."

His work in New York was the means of directing Prof. Rauschenbusch's interest toward the condition of the working people. Believing profoundly in the penetrating and inspiring powers of religion, his problem was how to connect the great latent forces of the Christian Church with the moral task of regenerating the collective life of organized society. After twenty years of study he wrote his first book on the subject. In 1912 he published "Christianizing the Social Order." In 1910 he published the "Prayers of the Social Awakening" which have been more quoted and reprinted than any of his other writings. In 1916 the International Young Men's Christian Association published his "Social Principles of Jesus," a text book of which twenty thousand copies were sold in a year.

In 1917 he wrote "A Theology for the Social Gospel," an effort to expand the inherited theological ideas to include the redemption of the organized life of society from the "Kingdom of Evil." This is regarded by many as the most important and thought provoking of all his books.

Even now, in war time, some of these books are being translated into Norwegian, Swedish, Finnish and Japanese.

He was one of the most popular speakers in the "forum movement," especially in New England. He most enjoyed audiences of students. A student said of him: "You can't help listening to him, for he is always saying something."

The funeral was held on Saturday afternoon July 27th, 1918, from the family home, Rochester, N. Y.

WILLIAM H. WINTON.

A Memorial to Letha Watts

By
LOUIS E. ORCUTT

SLIGHT, small, frail, little in body, but great in soul, Letha Watts is numbered among the humble heroines who have given their lives for the happiness of others. To her were given a sympathetic mind, a heart that loved widely, a hand skilled in helpfulness, and an unusual measure of ability to create and to perpetuate an organization. She came to her great opportunity in her teens. She saw the vision, followed the path of duty lying so clear before her, and spent herself in unselfish efforts to restore to society the men and women whom it had cast aside, the men who, once convicted, were forever condemned. She had the happiness to see hundreds of them make good. Then, last fall, her thoughts to the last with the boys whose hopes and heartaches she shared, her abounding spirit left her frail body to the gentle ministrations of friends and soared away to meet the Saviour, whose love ever constrained her to greater exertions for the work she had taken up.

But her spirit still invigorates the society she served, and moves the hearts of people in every corner of this broad land to do their part in the work of saving men from drifting into crime.

The organization which she so greatly influenced—the Prisoners' Relief Society—moved, just before her death, to Washington. She helped to plan the work, but had little opportunity to establish it on the larger scale now made possible by the new location. Her task was done, and Jesus took her home.

Now the society she loved, missing her sorely, is going on, blessed with her memory and the example of her self-denying efforts. It is becoming established. It is perfecting its methods. It is serving men as always. A fund of $3,000 is being raised to finance the work for the next six months. It is to be the foundation of a lasting memorial to this fine little woman who gave her life in unselfish devotion wholly to others.

IN a prison paper there appeared recently this quotation: "Nothing makes a prison to a human life but a defeated, broken spirit." "Stone walls do not a prison make," sang one of the poets. But worse than prison is the former attitude of the world at large toward the man who had paid the full legal penalty of his past offences. A man steals. He is sent up for five years. Good behavior shortens the time to a little under four. In every day of that four years, the man is girding himself to live honestly and to be square when he gets out. The term ends and he goes away. Every door is closed. He can not secure employment until he makes good, and he can't make good because he can't secure employment. Perhaps after a while he jumps into the river, or steals again. Then society condemns him over again and returns him to the grim-walled keep. If he does it a third time it calls him an habitual criminal and sends him up indefinitely, subject to the mercy of an overworked Parole Board. We all know the process, and we all know it is wrong.

Earl Dudding knew it; he proved it. He decided to put a stop to it; and he did, with the help of Letha Watts. Today hundreds of employers stand ready to employ the released prisoner, and thousands of men in prisons from Maine to California plead with the Prisoners' Relief Society to help them. Of all the 10,000 that have been helped more than 90 per cent. have made good. But it takes money to look up references, to send out hundreds of letters, to pay railroad fares for men who are penniless and friendless, to keep records, to render any worthwhile service. From its inception the Prisoners' Relief Society has been run at a very low expense. Scarcely a work of helpfulness anywhere has as much to show for every penny given to it, but even small and carefully regulated expenses will eventually use up large sums of money, and it is only the loyal support of hundreds of friends, many of them members of the Christian Herald Family, which has made the work possible.

RECENTLY a coal-mining company in West Virginia gave the society two ear-loads of coal. Through the interposition of a congressman from the state the Railway Administration permitted the delivery of the ears in Washington free of cost. The society has a building, rented on such favorable terms that subleases cover the entire rental and leave its office space free of cost. It has a building and the coal to heat it. It has a boundless opportunity, and it must have the money to meet it.

Never in the history of the country, since 1865, have men been so much needed in every industry. The men coming from prison may not enter the army or navy. They are welcome in the shops. But they don't know which shops. Dudding does. We good folks of the Christian Herald Family must see that Dudding and Miss Abbott, Miss Watts's successor as secretary and assistant treasurer of the society, have the money that will enable them to bring men and waiting jobs together.

The men pleaded by the society prove their manhood. Here is a typical letter received in May: "I have for some time been thinking that I should and I am now general supplies keeper, having been promoted May 1.

"I know that you place men where they can make good if they are willing to do their part and they are not discriminated against because of their past. While it looks dark to the man coming out of prison, yet the Prisoners' Relief Society is holding out a beacon light to every discharged prisoner, and if he only has any mettle, that light will illuminate his path and he will find that he can come back, and in many instances stronger than ever, because the society has awakened in him a new inspiration.

"It has indeed been a sad loss to the society in the death of its beloved Secretary, Miss Letha Watts, whose untiring efforts in behalf of the discharged prisoners had endeared her to the unfortunates throughout the nation, and all felt a kind of proud possession in her, a feeling of 'She belongs to us.' But though she is gone from us in body, yet she still lives, for her influence will go on."

THE Prisoners' Relief Society knows no color line. Here is a letter from a colored man who got his new start through the society: "Every night before I go to bed I get down on my knees and thank God that I am once more a man through the efforts of the Prisoners' Relief Society. I have been with the White Lead Company now six months and they have gradually increased my wages and I am getting $5.50 per day.

"There are several other colored men working here, two from Sing Sing prison, that your Society got jobs for.

"I am sending you One Dollar to help the good work along."

Are these old prisoners real men? Read this! "I really am doing fine, and the people I am with treat me as well as a firm could treat an employee. I have had several offers to make a change but have turned down all of them. They were all for more money than I am getting, but I felt that money was not the only thing to be considered, and that a rolling stone gathers no moss, so decided to stay where I am."

Here is a testimonial from a former newspaper correspondent who got in prison by the whisky route via a fight: "I have just finished a five-year sentence in the Colorado state penitentiary. When I was released the Prisoners' Relief Society secured me a job on the editorial staff of a Western newspaper. I had served two prison sentences. The guiding hand of the Prisoners' Relief Society has made a man out of me and I am now on the editorial staff of a Boston publication."

Another: "I am getting along fine with my new work and have had two small boosts in salary, and by the way, may say I bought my second Liberty Bond. I never would have served my second term in prison if your society had been in existence to vouch for me as you have this time.

"I am enclosing One Dollar as a little contribution to your work. My wife joins me in sending regards."

YES, these men make good; they are grateful; they prove it by their support; but they can't support the society altogether. It needs you.

In hundreds of cases, some little woman is waiting to help that man make good. Through the years of his imprisonment she has lived, the Lord knows how, has kept the little family together, has been loyal to one who by all human standards had forfeited all claim to loyalty, but she was true and her true heart will help him stay square and to make good, if only he gets the opportunity. The opportunities are more certain now that the Prisoners' Relief Society has demonstrated the sterling mettle in these once branded men.

A report from Miss Evalyn Abbott, secretary and assistant treasurer, dated June 12, 1918, gives the total cash receipts of the society, including money turned over to them by the Christian Herald, since January 1, as $1,672.

For the sake of our humanity, for the sake of our country in its need of men, for the sake of the wives and babies whose names must be cleared of shame, and for the memory of Letha Watts, who gave her life, will you not give, today, all you can, to insure the continuation of this work of restoration, this re-making of men?

Send your gifts for the Prisoners' Relief Society to Room 93, Bible House, New York City, in care of the Christian Herald, and they will be promptly forwarded.

The Singing Soldiers

"The men went singing into the trenches."—Press Dispatch.

SINGING they go in old-time fashion
To the murderous trenches of wasted
France;
And quick in our souls flares a leaping passion
Of pride in these Knights of the New Romance.
Never a guidon of glory beckons,
And war stands stark as a hideous thing,
Since with hate incarnate their valor reckons,
And yet, as they go to the test, they sing.

Oh, singing lads in the gloom-choked trenches,
The Heart of the Nation sings with you!
Proud is that Heart mid grief that wrenches,
Honored and glad in the deeds you'll do.
Singing you go; may you singing return to us
In your carefree, casual Yankee way;
And may the flame of your high courage burn to us,
Forging the sword of our faith today!

Speaking for Christ

International Sunday School Lesson for August 25

Luke 12:8-12 and Acts 1:1-8

The Christian Use of the Tongue

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

MAN has been described as the animal that talks. To be sure, there are other animals that make sounds and convey more or less of direction and warning to one another. But to man alone has been granted the real reasoned speech that has been rightly called one of his supreme spiritual endowments. The ability to speak is said to be an important controlling factor in the very development of the brain itself, and thought without speech would be almost fatally crippled.

Religion depends on communion between God and man and between man and his brother. The Bible has given us the very terms in which we conceive of the supreme issues of life and eternity. The Book of Psalms is full of calls to prayer and exhortations to praise the Lord and make known his marvelous works to his children. Proverbs abounds with wise observations on the good and bad uses of speech. Paul continually advised his converts on the control of their conversation to the highest ends: "Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt, that ye may know how ye ought to answer every man." James, in his letter on practical Christian living, puts his classic essay on the Tongue in the central place. He feels that this is the danger point in most lives! He is confident that the man who offends not in word will be able to bridle all his other powers.

Not Silenced But Transformed

Oh, what a pity it is that so much human speech is almost hopelessly vulgarized! The talk of many a community is the biggest factor in its degradation. How it must pain the Spirit of God to hear the common speech of multitudes whom God destined for fellowship with himself in the highest and holiest possibilities of life! The tendency of ignoble speech is downward. It paves the way for immorality of conduct and selfish materialistic conceptions of the meaning of our whole existence.

In other groups the talk is not so dirty nor so brutal, but is always flip-pant, smart and exaggerated. The daily conversation colors the life, and superficiality is the result. Ideals and consecration are laughed out of court among such people.

But the earnest, thoughtful, clean speech of Christian companionship is one of life's richest joys. Old Izaak Walton, the famous angler, well says: "A companion who is free from swearing and scurrilous discourse is worth gold." He knew the difference between a pleasure excursion with the right kind of friends and the unfortunate trip marred by the vulgarities of low and coarse acquaintances. He did not hesitate to rebuke one companion openly, saying that the very stable boys were contaminated by this "gentleman."

Now Christianity, rightly understood, never takes any of the joy out of life. With the tongue it teaches happier uses. It does not silence but transforms, just as in countless other ways Jesus came "not to destroy but to fulfill." Something is wrong if conversion means only the stilling of a noisy swearing man or a sharp-tongued gossip young woman. Because it has meant to so many a new and joyous speech of the higher, better, more helpful things. The Christian singer sings on, but with a new note caught from the heavenly symphonies. The Christian public man continues his campaigning, but his speeches have a ring of sincerity and disinterestedness lacking in the self-seeking politician. The Christian lad is still hail fellow well met with his schoolmates, but his influence is for the best interests of the school and the community.

I know of an instance where a family of nice girls went to work in a factory where the talk was pretty common and demoralizing. Unlike so many young women, they did not sink to the level they found. Their voices were like Cornelia's, "gentle and low, an excellent thing in woman." Their conversation was clean and uplifting, highly interesting, with topics many of the others had never discussed before. Not one girl could take offense at them. They displayed no sense of superiority, but were thoroughly friendly. The final result was a new and better environment for dozens of the workers, and not a few interested in the doings of a Christian church.

Now, these girls would have made a fatal error had they gone among their new associates with a lot of pious jargon, repeating stock phrases of religion. Many of us have seen examples of mistaken witnessing for Jesus, which alienated those whom wiser methods would have won. We must often be wise as serpents as well as innocent as doves. Our talk must be all of one texture, not three-fourths common chatter and one-fourth (or one-tenth) sanctimonious expressions of superior holiness. That is unconscious hypocrisy. To witness everywhere and always truly for Jesus to the transforming of lives we must have a sane, wholesome, high standard of hearty intercourse with others. Even without a direct word of challenge or invitation the leavening of God's Spirit often works. More usually the opportunity arrives sooner or later for the timely word of warning in a confidential way, or for a real heart-to-heart talk on the claim of Jesus on lives for the coming Kingdom.

There is a great danger in leading young children into premature efforts at direct testimony for Christ that will be unnatural and in the end harmful to the devout little disciples. It is not natural for children to speak glibly about soul experiences. We must keep our Junior Societies clear of these pitfalls of speech. We must keep our regular Young People's Societies from becoming "talky-talk" associations, which is just the term one red-blooded young college man applied to those he had known. When we do speak a word for Jesus we must "say something."

When we go out into a non-Christian environment, the danger of being "too preachy" is still greater. Fault-finding or the "holier than thou" attitude must be guarded against. But the remedy is not keeping silent while our convictions are outraged and being still when the very stones almost cry out. It is in a sane, hearty religious speech that gives no cause for shame or sneering.

The Gospel Message Pervading the World

"Ye are my witnesses" rings out from the Master still. Whether lofty or humble in station, we represent him to the listening world. The worldly may not seem to heed, but they are quick enough to judge just the same. "His manner of speech does not remind me of Jesus of Nazareth," said a man who had been thrown by chance into intimate fellowship with one who was considered quite a churchman. That is a very different report from those who took knowledge of the early disciples that they had been with Jesus. When thoroughly Christian speech comes from the lips of professed believers everywhere the Gospel will be unconsciously preached in the daily intercourse of life.

A special call rings out today as ever for trained speakers and leaders in the evangelization of the world. Do not leave this lesson without setting before your boys and girls the possibility of their being called to preach, to teach, to evangelize, as a life career. If you hold before them the wondrous opportunities of the future, you may start some young life toward leadership in the mighty enterprises of God's kingdom. Even those who shall have other vocations may become factors of importance as lay speakers, members of Gospel teams, visitors in city missions or country schoolhouses. Our home churches need laymen and laywomen who can address meetings, lead classes and conduct our organizations. Religion, like politics, needs the gift of tongues.

Patriotism and the Use of the Tongue

We are learning some valuable lessons, even about the Christian's manner of speech, from the great wave of patriotic fervor in our times. We are being told that one who speaks disparagingly of his country is a traitor, and one who spreads rumors may be a dangerous enemy to our cause. To repeat slanders about our leaders is the temptation of many citizens. The church has suffered much from the thoughtless tongues of Christians who misrepresented their own great cause. Many a child in the home has heard thoughtless criticism of the pastor and the church workers and has had his confidence undermined. Many a newcomer in a community has heard from her callers just the very things that would prevent her giving her allegiance to the church and her fellowship to its laborers.

The good name of your pastor, your church officers, and to some extent your Master, are in your keeping. Forbearance and self-control are among the primary gifts of the Holy Spirit. If we cannot speak the Word with power the very least we can do is to guard our lips from speaking ill. In the beautiful description of the good woman at the close of the Proverbs, there is this fine line of praise: "The law of kindness is on her tongue." How many blunders, how many heartaches, how many shameful things would have been avoided if every Christian tongue were governed by that gentle rule, "The law of kindness"! It would do more than suppress evil; it would lead to appreciation. Hearts are waiting all about us for the word of sympathy and love.

He Wrote "He Leadeth Me"

REV. JOSEPH H. GILMORE, D.D., author of the famous hymn "He Leadeth Me," written before the Battle of Gettysburg, died at the age of 84 years in his home in Rochester, N. Y., on July 23, 1918.

"He Leadeth Me" was written hastily in a moment of inspiration, on March 26, 1862, and has been sung in tens of thousands of churches, in mining camps and in far-off missionary fields and translated into probably more foreign languages than any other modern hymn. It is included in nearly every large collection of sacred songs.

Dr. Gilmore himself told how the hymn was written. "I was supplying for a couple of Sundays the pulpit of the First Baptist Church in Philadelphia. At the mid-week service I set out to give the people an exposition of the twenty-third Psalm, but I did not get farther than the words 'He leadeth Me.' Those words took hold of me as they had never done before. It was the darkest hour of the War of the Rebellion.

"At the close of the meeting Deacon Wattson kept talking about the thought I had emphasized; and then and there, on a blank page of the brief from which I had intended to speak, I penciled the hymn and handed it to my wife.

"It occurred to her months afterward to send the hymn to the 'Watchman and Reflector' in Boston, where it was first printed. It attracted the attention of William B. Bradbury, who slightly modified the refrain and set the hymn to the music which has done so much to promote its popularity. As I wrote the hymn the refrain consisted of only two lines. Mr. Bradbury added the other two."

Dr. Joseph H. Gilmore was born in Boston April 29, 1834, the son of Joseph Albee Gilmore, governor of New Hampshire and Ann Whipple Gilmore. At Brown University he was a classmate of the late John Hay, Secretary of State under Presidents McKinley and Roosevelt. He was called to the pastorate of the Second Baptist Church of Rochester, N. Y., in 1865, and occupied the pulpit for two years, when he was appointed to the chair of English language and literature at the University of Rochester. He retired in 1908 after more than forty years of service. W. H. W.

Marion Harland's Corner

"The Kindly Fruits of the Earth"

THE familiar phrase is apt and felicitous as it is usually employed. I purpose today to make it widely comprehensive. Never, perhaps, in the history of man has the vegetable kingdom played so conspicuous a part in the human dietary as now. Government has restricted the use of meats. Even in communities where rations are not prescribed, prohibitive prices put "beasts of meat," poultry, and sometimes fish, beyond the reach of families of moderate means. We submit cheerfully to the law, and comfort ourselves with the knowledge that we, too, are serving our country as truly, if less actively, as those who are risking their lives in trench and open field.

Turn we then, with gratitude to the Giver of "kindly fruits," to the wealth of vegetables. It is like the discovery of new virtues and talents in old friends to learn how nearly many so-called common vegetables can supply the deficiencies in our daily fare.

Suppose we vary the discussion of wheat substitutes by looking up dishes that will fitly fill the vacant place at the foot of the family board on meatless days. Let us bring ingenuity and experience to bear upon the task of making the produce of our gardens "taste good," and nourish brain, muscle and nerves.

Eggplant on the Half-Shell

In former days we would have demanded cold chicken to make this "leading dish" palatable. Now we content ourselves with buying a half-pint can of chicken bouillon for ten cents when we purchase our fine firm eggplant. Wash and wipe the latter, and cook it, whole and without peeling it, for ten minutes in boiling water. Let it get perfectly cold and stiff before cutting it lengthwise into halves. Scrape out the heart, taking care not to crack the walls, which should be three-quarters of an inch thick. Save all the pulp. Have ready-made a good force-meat of a cupful of fine dry bread crumbs, a tablespoonful of fat salt pork, hoiled and cold, and chopped fine. If you have a left-over of cold veal, or ham, use it instead of the pork. Any cooked white meat will do. Mix with this the reserved pulp, also chopped fine, and season with a tablespoonful of melted butter (or nut butter or oleo); salt and pepper to taste; moisten with a few spoonfuls of your canned soup, and make into a smooth mass. Fill the hollowed halves of the eggplant with this, rounding slightly and evenly. This done, sprinkle thickly with fine dry crumbs and lay the filled halves, stuffed sides up, in a roaster. Pour the rest of the soup around them, diluting with butter and water if you have not enough to keep the eggplant from burning. Bake, covered, nearly an hour, basting with butter and water four times. Transfer the halves to a hot dish and set in the open oven while you thicken the gravy left in the roaster with browned flour; boil up once and pour around the eggplant in the hot platter. If rightly seasoned, this is a most savory dish.

Fried Eggplant

Pare the skin from an eggplant; cut into round slices half an inch thick and lay in cold salt and water for an hour. Wipe dry, and dip each slice in beaten egg, then in cracker-dust slightly salted. Set in a cold place for an hour and fry in deep fat. Drain in a hot colander before dishing. It should be freed from every drop of grease.

Stuffed Cucumbers

This is an Oriental dish, and so much more relishful than might be imagined by one who has never eaten it, that I make room for it here confidently. Select young but large cucumbers and cut them into halves lengthwise. Remove the seeds and fill the cavities thus left with a forcemeat of fine bread crumbs and minced cold ham. Moisten with melted butter or dripping, and season with pepper and a little onion-juice. Fit the halves together in the original form of the cucumbers, and bind into shape with soft cotton twine. Lay in a roaster and pour about them a cupful of soup-stock or, if you have none, canned beef bouillon, and cook until they are tender. Baste several times with the gravy. Clip and remove the strings carefully; thicken the gravy left in the pan with browned flour and pour about the cucumbers.

A Vegetable Chowder

Heat two tablespoonfuls of nut-butter or a substitute in a saucepan and brown in it four good-sized onions, sliced. When they are nicely colored, add four large tomatoes peeled and cut into cubes, one chopped sweet green pepper and a cupful of green corn cut from the cob. Lastly, add a cupful of water and a little butter, season with salt, a rounded teaspoonful of sugar and a dash of paprika. Cook, covered, for an hour, stirring every ten minutes. Serve very hot in soup-plates.

Green Corn Soufflé

Grate the grains from a dozen ears of corn. Mix with it the whipped yolks of three eggs, and when you have a custard-like compound, add a tablespoonful of melted butter and the same of sugar; salt to taste, and stir in quickly a pinch of baking soda. Now add the whites of the eggs whipped into a stiff meringue. Turn into a buttered pudding-dish and bake, covered, half an hour. Brown delicately and serve at once.

Baked Mushrooms

You may gather these in abundance in sunny uplands in many parts of the country. They are offered for sale at moderate prices in city shops all the year round.

Wash and peel the mushrooms and cut off the stems. Make a forcemeat by mincing these stems very fine after scraping off the skin. Arrange the mushrooms, under-sides upward, in a pudding-dish, and put a tiny bit of butter into each. Season with pepper and salt, and when the lowest layer is complete, spread over it the minced stems well-seasoned with salt and white pepper. Two layers of the whole mushrooms and the same of the chopped stems should be enough for one dish. Dot the uppermost layer with bits of butter and bake, closely covered, for about twenty minutes. Have ready a little melted butter and pour over the upper layer; leave in the oven five minutes to color very delicately, and send to table.

Onions au Gratin

Full-grown but young onions are best for this dish. The essential is that they must be tender. Skin, and trim at top and bottom; lay in a saucepan in hot salted water and cook for twenty minutes. Drain off all the water and return the onions to the fire; cover with a cupful of scalding hot milk in which has been dissolved a bit of baking-soda no bigger than a green pea. Cook in a double boiler for five minutes. Then lay the onions in order in a hot, greased pudding-dish; season to taste with salt and pepper; stir a teaspoonful of cornstarch wet with cold water into the hot milk, and pour over the onions. Cover the surface with finely grated cheese, and bake to a light brown. Send to table very hot in the dish in which they were cooked.

Cauliflower au Gratin

Divide a fine cauliflower into clusters, each having a short stem. Put on to boil in hot salted water and keep it there until it is tender. Drain off the water, lay the clusters in a baking-dish, stems downward, and pour over all a nice white sauce in which you have mixed the yolks of two hard-boiled eggs minced into a coarse powder. Scatter fine bread-crumbs over the top; sprinkle with white pepper and dot with butter. Bake to a light brown.

It is not practicable to treat this vital subject fully in the space of a single article. It will be my pleasure to introduce into succeeding issues of the Corner recipes for the best methods of cooking numerous other kindly fruits.

I cannot close today's talk without bringing to the notice of our fellow members a couple of recipes contributed by an esteemed correspondent that have to do with one of our most valuable and popular vegetables—the tomato.

Baked Tomatoes

Do not peel the tomatoes. Remove the pulp carefully and mix it, when chopped, with half the quantity of cold boiled spaghetti (fine macaroni) also minced. Season with a tablespoonful of melted butter (or a substitute), half a teaspoonful of onion-juice, salt and pepper to taste. Arrange the tomato-shells in a well-greased pudding-dish and fill them with the mixture, spreading it evenly on top. Dot the surface with little bits of butter, and cover with grated cheese. Fit the tops on neatly and bake, covered, in a moderate oven.

Broiled Tomatoes

Cut the tomatoes in two, leaving the skins on. Place on a well-buttered broiler with the skin-side down; dust with salt and pepper, and broil, without turning, over a moderate fire twenty minutes. Lay them on a hot dish and spread each piece with melted butter. Or the tomatoes may be cut in thick slices, buttered and then broiled, turning frequently. If you (and your readers) approve of these, I will send two more, which I believe to be as novel, and which I know are as toothsome.—Mrs. S. C. F. (Baltimore).

Let us have the "tried and approved" recipes by all means. Anything that lessens the consumption of flesh-foods is of positive value in the times in which we are living.

A Quart a Day For a Child, They Say

A Noted Food Authority Says:

"No young person can be expected to thrive on less than a pint of milk daily. And a quart is the right amount."

Multiply Its Goodness By Floating Puffed Grains in It

Milk is a cheap food. It is a complete food when whole-grain is served with it.

It is an essential food for young folks.

To all it is the one indispensable food.

Here is the way to make the milk dish vastly more delightful—a way which millions use.

Float Puffed Grains in it—sometimes Puffed Rice, sometimes Puffed Wheat, sometimes Corn Puffs.

The Wheat and Rice are whole grains puffed to bubbles. They are steam exploded to eight times normal size. They are thin, airy, toasted morsels, with exquisite nut-like flavor.

Corn Puffs are corn hearts puffed in a like way.

All taste like food confections. But the purpose of puffing is to blast every food cell—to make digestion easy and complete.

These are the best-cooked grain foods in existence. So the greatest food a child can have is some Puffed Grain in milk. And the proper daily allotment is all that a child will eat.

Like Puffed Nuts For Breakfast

For breakfast serve with cream and sugar, or mixed with any fruit—each morning a different Puffed Grain.

Also use like nut meats as garnish for ice cream. Also as wafers in soups.

Salvation Army Calls for Workers

THE War Work of the Salvation Army is taxing the resources of that fine force of workers, because of its rapid increase. Extensions of the work are being thrust upon the Army authorities, so that to meet the increased need they find themselves short of the trained workers required and are asking for one thousand volunteers for this service. A brief season of intensive training is being planned, and such workers, after passing through that school, would go over to France as special war-time officers of the Salvation Army, without in any way affecting their denominational affiliations.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

IT was a hushed June evening in New York City—a still, sweet-scented night. The moon and stars were out. The city's rumble had dropped to a drowsy hum. And the sparrows who live in my back yard were settling down for the night with contented chirps.

They knew nothing of war! Sore-hearted and desolate, I sat by the open window, listening to them; marveling at their freedom from grief. For to me, their downhearted neighbor, the day had been one of anguish. I had said good-by to my only brother, preparatory to his sailing overseas. And the vision of him—straight and tall and proud and laughing—still beat against my eyelids.

I had no exact knowledge as to the hour or day of his sailing, of course; for that is not permitted. All I knew was that, until this war was over, and Right had once more triumphed in the world, I should never see his laughing face again.

Most of you know—women neighbors of mine—the anguish of that hour: the pain and glory of it. We women give our all; and we do it gladly and humbly and with a prayer on our lips. And we laugh bravely, if a bit shakily. We laugh while he hurries down the steps, and while he stops at the corner to wave and smile. We laugh until those sturdy young shoulders in khaki have swung out of sight around a corner of the street.

And then, then we return; and there follows an hour . . .

This hour was upon me. I was bitter and rebellious; for we are human, we mothers and wives and sisters. And we are pitifully weak!

I tried to think of comforting passages from the Bible; and the promise "I will not leave you comfortless" came to me. But I was unable to accept it.

"What comfort," I thought desperately, "can there be?"

There was no answer, for a moment, except the sleepy twittering of little birds, the stirring of trees, the faint breathing of the city.

AND then (as though angels had answered) there suddenly sounded, from the Soldiers' and Sailors' Canteen a few doors away, the notes of a piano, followed by the most glorious outburst of singing I have ever heard in my life—the voices of clean, manly, heroic American lads calling out to the anxious world their message of determination and high hopes. It was the "Battle Hymn of the Republic" they were singing; and every word of it rang like a promise to God.

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord;

He is trampling out the vineyard where the grapes of wrath are stored;

He has loosed the fateful lightning of his terrible swift sword;

His Truth is marching on!

"The glory of the coming of the Lord"—"His Truth is marching on!" the words thrilled through and through me. I sprang to my feet, and leaned out of the window. And I saw, instead of my back yard, a great battle-field across which His Truth was, indeed, "marching on." All bitterness left me. Peace and comfort floated in. I dropped my head against my arm, and the tears came—healing tears that I shall never forget.

And I determined to tell all of you—you who are being torn by war partings—of the earnest, consecrated singing of those lads of ours. If every mother, sister, wife and sweetheart could have heard it, it would have shamed all self-pity out of her as it did out of me. How I longed to have all the women in the land hear it! For it would have braced them, and filled them with the determination that they, too, would sing of God's glory and the ultimate triumph of Right.

This, dear adventurers, we will have to do, if we are to keep pace with our boys. They are going through the purging fire of a noble warfare, with a song on their lips. And we must not lag behind. We, too, must sing!—even if it be through tears. This is our warfare, here at home. This is our "job." So let us be up and at it. Gathering our townfolk together, let us hold the Good News Day suggested several weeks ago; or, if not that, then a Community "Sing."

THAT some communities are already awake to the need of this is proved by the following beautiful letters:

Community "Sing" to Speed Departing Soldiers

At the request of our pastor and his wife, about three hundred people assembled at our little church Friday evening, July 19, 1918, to send four soldiers to help our country defend the right. Two of them are members of the church, and we are proud to send two such noble brothers.

The way our community-gathering originated was this: I had been much impressed with the ideas Miss Connolly expressed about a Community Sing. I had mentioned them to my pastor's wife, and she had told me we would try to have a Community Sing in the near future. The plan seemed to strike all the members as a fine way to send our boys off "smiling," and our preparations began.

Our time was limited, our invitations being sent Friday A. M. We certainly kept the wires busy! Meantime, the ladies prepared refreshments. Although haying and harvest were on hand, we all showed that we were interested in making the departure of those boys a happy one.

Lanterns were strung on wires near the entry, as the weather was so warm it would be too uncomfortable in the church. The exercises were announced by our pastor. Our first number was the singing of "America." And did we sing? The words fairly rang. Each one was given an opportunity to speak the first pieces they had spoken at school. Old men did cause so much laughter when they recited their little poems or sang a song! The writer sang "A Dinky Lullaby," and was encored twice!

Patriotic songs were sung. Then our soldier boys were called upon, and each responded. At the close of the exercises, the four soldiers were called to the platform, and two little Sunday school tots presented each with a beautiful bouquet. And while the flowers were being presented, all joined in singing "Blest Be the Tie that Binds." The boys thanked us all for making their last day with us so pleasant; and they were very much surprised when they each received a kit containing a token—such as towel, soap, khaki handkerchief—from each lady of the church. Refreshments were served, after which all went to their homes, feeling that "the boy sent away with a smile is the boy worth while." Mrs. JOHN QUINCY.

Wisconsin.

That splendid letter brought the tears to my eyes, and a smile to my lips. Can't you picture that little rural church, surrounded by warm-hearted patriotic men and women, their voices raised in song? Ah, dear little rural church, would that every great city church would gather its flock about its doors in that way.

Perhaps the city church cannot do that; but there is much it can do towards stimulating an interest in singing. Here, for instance, is what one city church has done. This adventure occurred before the present war began; but such a club is as practical today as then, and is more bitterly needed:

Glee Club for Young Folks

The young folks of our church were slowly drifting away. This kept up until our big-hearted assistant minister found the reason. There was nothing to interest the young people. He discovered somehow that while very few of them knew much about music, they at least knew how to sing. So he started a Glee Club. Some church members were skeptical as to the results, declaring that when the novelty of the thing wore off, the young folks would drift away again. But this proved a false prophecy! The young people became so wrapped up in their Glee Club that, after they had mastered a number of good selections, they decided they would give a concert.

The church itself was a prosperous one, but instead of holding their concert where those of wealth might come to criticize (?), the young folks of the Glee Club went to the poorer section of their district, and gave the music-starved people there an opportunity to have something different from what the hurdy-gurdy played. The people enjoyed it so much that they asked the members to please, please come again! A concert was, therefore, held there each month, and finally, because of this Glee Club and some other activities along community development lines, a Neighborhood Settlement House was established.

The original Glee Club (the old members of which are now married and scattered) has been increased; and old and young gather once every week to learn to appreciate the best in music and to sing their sorrows away.

Surely, Community Glee Clubs, or Community Singing, would help a great deal towards keeping up the spirits of the folks at home, so that they would write cheery letters to their dear ones on the field of battle. If any neighbor wishes to start a Community Singing Club, I would gladly give a list of the simple things we sang at our Glee Club.

C. D. LANE.

Truly, the oak that grew from this acorn was a very big and beautiful one! There is no telling what influence on a community, or county or state, one's simplest endeavor may eventually have.

WHICH brings us to our last adventure for the day; an original one, and very touching. I am wondering if the elderly folk of your neighborhood would not welcome such a loving attention, with tremulous lips and eager, wistful eyes, thus rewarding you a thousand times over for your effort? Do make the experiment, and let me know!

A Community Choir

I have read most of the Adventures in Neighboring, but have not seen any account of a custom similar to the one we have here. So many times you read of what is being done for the young people, to keep them interested in the farm and country life. But this custom belongs entirely to the old people—those who have passed the three-score years and ten.

We have here a Community Choir—one of the very first organized in this part of the state. We had Community Sings before the word was printed in the magazines and the work of such organizations published abroad. Our choir has always been on the lookout for ways to make itself useful.

Not being content with singing at patriotic gatherings and union church services, it went out into the byways and found many an old person, whose days of active service were over, and to these—as a labor of love—it carried its message of song. It learns of the birthday coming, and on that evening it serenades the aged friend. There has been many a surprise for the serenaders as well; for some member of the family learns of the plan and a social hour follows, with birthday refreshments.

Happy memories of that birthday-serenade brighten the days to come; and sometimes little gifts are left by the choir, at others a shower of post-cards, at others a bouquet—whatever seems to be most suitable for the occasion.

This may be a simple thing to do; but it has brought joy to many a heart that felt that the young folks had no time for those who had given up the burdens of life and were waiting for the shadows.

IDA LOUISE SWEET.

And now, fellow adventurers, today's meeting is over. We have "sung" our way through it; and it is my hope that each of us will bear a song away to some war-saddened community, and there plant the song like a seed.

Meantime, let us not forget the contest announced in the July 3 issue: the Good News Day Contest. Some very wonderful letters about this have already come in to me; but there is still plenty of time for all communities which have not yet entered the Contest, to do so by holding a Good News Day at once and sending me the account of it by September 1, when the Contest closes.

A FORTNIGHT from now, Christian Herald comrades, we shall gather about our round-table again, for the discussion of an issue that is fast becoming of national as well as community importance. So be sure not to miss the August 28 issue!

Young People's Topics for August 25

The Power of the Cross on the Frontier

Christian Endeavor Topic. Ps. 107: 33-43.

Woman's Part in Home Missions

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Acts 9: 36-43

THESE two topics are so closely related that we will treat them together. Home Missions is inseparably linked with the frontier. The pioneer churches frequently grew out of Sunday Bible classes or week-night prayer meetings started by some woman whose faith held her nearer to God as the distance widened between her and the old church back home. The pioneer preacher, on his first round, frequently found a work started by some mother in Israel, and building upon her foundation, surely laid, he was able to gather together in her parlor or kitchen a group of believers and to start a church. Thus it happens that many a spire now points heavenward because a woman sought the means of grace. And as the frontier moved westward and a set led civilization grew up about the pioneer churches, the same women formed home mission societies which helped to send the Gospel to the still sparsely settled regions beyond. But all the religious pioneers were not women by any means. Many a deacon in New England became a farmer-minister in the West. In the early days the frontier was a wild place, where races fought for mastery and life meant struggle. The Cross, upheld by men and women who fought Indians and drought and stubborn soil and reluctant mine as well as any, conquered the wilderness, made the law respected, fostered education, and became the center of a new and a better civilization. Out of the former Wild West have come the Prohibition movement and the Woman Suffrage movement of today. Both started in the East but went West to grow up with the country. Out of the West came also better prison methods, new educational ideals, and a passion for a religion of service which enriched the Church of the East and stimulated both home and foreign missions. Now, although there are still in the West stretches of newly opened land and sparsely settled territory, where the home missionary is finding the same old opportunities for civilization-building as of old, the biggest home mission problem lies in the cities of the East, where thousands of foreign-born immigrants, seekers after the liberty of the West, require at our hands instruction in our language, the vehicle of our ideals of freedom; in citizenship, the working out of our ideals; and in faith, the only basis for true liberty, the only safeguard for ideals. These form a new frontier. In this new field of home missions the women's societies are doing yeoman service. Leaders of the B. Y. P. U. can secure information regarding the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society by addressing the Secretary at 2969 Vernon Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Remedies for Intemperance

Epworth League Topic. Eph. 5: 15-21

THE Apostle was not merely piecing together words when he said "Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess, but be filled with the Spirit." There is just one cure for intemperance and drunkenness, and that is the shed blood of the Lord Jesus Christ. The Keeley cure, the dipsomania hospitals, the various sanitariums offer only temporary relief, for none of them gives the victim of intemperance a new heart. But, penitent before the mercy seat, the victim of drink, acknowledging his sin and craving pardon and salvation, is given a new heart purged of appetite. If, rising from his knees, he goes forth in prayer and praise and does not forget to keep always close to God, he will be filled with the Spirit and kept from falling, his weak will strengthened by the power of the omnipotent. Saving faith in God is a cure for intemperance. There are various remedies. Local option is one remedy, sort of a local anesthetic. High license, often suggested as a remedy, is really an intensifier of the trouble. Will power, the favorite remedy for those who wish to tattle just a little, is a betrayer, and prohibition, the best remedy we have, does not destroy appetite, it only exasperates it. But the grace of God in the heart destroys appetite. It turns the thoughts to higher things than bodily desires; it changes a man's mind from an attitude of resistance to evil to an attitude of desire for service in doing good. Real conversion makes the man a new creature in Christ Jesus, and it cures intemperance.

A Soul With the Service Passion

MRS. EMMA W. MORGAN, wife of Dr. Charles H. Morgan, editor of the Missionary Education Movement, was deeply devoted to the Christian Herald as an agency in her work. She died in New York City on March 14, after a life spent in kindly Christian ministry, teaching and guiding children, and talking to circles of mothers. Most of her unostentatious acts of Christian benevolence, during her fifteen years in New York, are known only to the recording angel and to the friendless ones to whom she ministered.

One such instance was that of Jack K., whom she first saw drunk on a Lexington Avenue car, New York City. She talked to him, woke up his better manhood, and took him and his wife to her home. In the years that have passed there have been some lapses, but Jack and his wife are sober, happy, and hopeful to-day.

All her life Mrs. Morgan taught and guided the children. How they loved her! Toward the end she gave her talks to circle after circle of mothers. The deaconess leader of such a circle cried out: "She was so thoroughly good that her goodness just radiated from her. She never spoke in private or in public but that it was an inspiration. She lived in her lifetime what many could not have done had they lived more than a full century. No one will ever know in this life how many she has helped to uplift and bring into the kingdom."

New Christian Endeavor Home

THE new Headquarters Building of the United Society of Christian Endeavor was dedicated July 31. It stands at the corner of Mt. Vernon and Joy Streets, Boston, on the highest point of Beacon Hill. More than one hundred thousand Endeavorers in all parts of the world contributed to its erection, the cost of which, including the land, was something more than $200,000. At the dedicatory mass-meeting in Ford Hall a message of congratulation from President Wilson was read. Then followed addresses by Governor McCall, Ex-Governor John L. Bates, Rev. T. Makino, vice-president of the Japanese Christian Endeavor Union, Dr. William Shaw, and President Clark.

First Aid Book—Free

The Vital 15 Minutes

In every home there comes a time of accident or emergency. Nearly everyone at some time faces a vital 15 minutes—before the doctor comes.

Then a First Aid Book—the right one—may save serious consequences. Without it you may do the wrong thing—or do nothing. It is folly to take that risk.

We have asked Dr. G. M. Blech—an eminent authority—to write us a First Aid Book. He has been Director-in-Chief of a Red Cross Field Corps. He is a Major in the Medical Corps of the U. S. Army.

The book is clear and complete. It contains 90 illustrations. It tells what to do in any sort of accident, in any form of poisoning. Also what to do for

Hemorrhage	Sprains	Frostbite
Fainting	Bruises	Sunstroke
Shock	Burns	Drowning

And nearly anything else which may happen. That is, what to do before the doctor comes. It is not to urge home treatment.

We offer this book free, postpaid, to any home.

Always call the doctor—remember
First Aid is only first aid

For Safety's Sake Have B & B Dressings Ready

We ask you to buy the B&B Dressings. The reason is this:

There can be little protection in first aid if you use a casual dressing. If the skin is broken—even slightly—it may infect the wound.

All B&B Dressings that would be applied to wounds are repeatedly sterilized. After they are wrapped they are sterilized again by live steam following a vacuum. To the very center of the package every germ is killed. The wrappings are sealed to keep out contamination.

Every home should have such dressings constantly on hand. For safety's sake they should be B&B. These are double-sure.

Prepare for emergencies with B&B Surgical Dressings. Buy from your druggist what you need.

B&B Absorbent Cotton
B&B Bandages B&B Gauze
B&B Adhesive Plaster, etc.

*The woods are touched with mystery, there's magic in the air;
There's laughter in the purple depths that mingles with a prayer;
And leaves glow red because the wind has left his kisses there!*

Chains—Which?

Will you put them on your tires?
—or have the Law put them on your wrists?

For you are to blame if your car skids. You are responsible if it swings into a pedestrian.

Knowing how to drive a car means knowing its limitations.

A chainless car on a slippery pavement is an uncertain car. You are expected to know this and be prepared.

Make your choice now — or Fate may make it for you.

Put chains on your tires.

Safety! For pedestrians, for yourself.

that appeared in The New York Evening Post—one of a series supported by leading business concerns and individuals whose object is to protect and conserve human life.

The above injunction to Mr. Motorist by the conservative, unselfish, far-seeing business men is of the same spirit that inspires the advertisements of Weed Tire Chains which prevent thousands of accidents and save thousands of lives.

For a number of years we have advertised the fact that the chief cause of automobile accidents is skidding and that Tire Chains are the only mechanical device that is absolutely dependable to make slippery roads safe. But printers' ink does not seem to make any impression on careless drivers.

Only two things can reach and weed out the driver who persists in driving with chainless tires on wet-slippery-skiddy roads — fear of the law and the mighty power of public opinion. Help us chain him to safety.

When Zion's Sorrow Turned to Joy

The Story of Jerusalem's Fight With Famine, Fever and Oppression Before Welcome Relief Came

By JOHN D. WHITING

From a recent letter to a friend in Michigan. Used by permission. Mr. Whiting was an eyewitness of the scenes he describes.

A VERY common food in this country is "Esau's pottage" made of lentils. With it is usually served a dish called "labban," which is a sort of clabbered milk. The pottage retains heat for a long time, while the labban is eaten quite cold. A telling Arab proverb runs as follows: "After being burned by the pottage one blows on the labban." So with us. Even your innocent letters, so full of active sympathy for the starving and needy about us, were burned at the time the whole Colony was in fear of being exiled, lest the Turkish censor should put some false interpretation upon them. Had it not been for the destruction of these letters we could now write to our friends individually and give them an outline of what their kind offerings meant to those suffering about us. And not to the poor alone, for life would have been unbearable under the conditions had not one been able to lend a helping hand and do more than just sympathize with those in distress.

I shall try to give you a short outline of what we passed through since the outbreak of the war. It is to be borne in mind that no note-books or diaries could be kept. Therefore it will be impossible to make allusions to dates.

Some time before the outbreak of hostilities a curious rumor went around that sealed letters had been sent to all the sheiks of the various villages, with the word that they should not be opened until especially ordered to do so, when the contents should be read and acted on. The great apprehension was at once jumped at that there was to be a general massacre. What was the real purport of these letters and the consequences which would be incurred, we little dreamed of then. About the same time, some of our young people planned a camping trip to East Jordan lands and several German acquaintances asked to join our party. On the entire trip the conversation between the Germans, both men and women, was war. On one occasion, when a toast was proposed (over lemonade) the German chancellor desired to drink to war. Our women objected, so the answer came, "All right; for your sake we drink to peace; but if war comes, then to a finish." In the face of these and other facts which we have personally experienced, Germany's assertions of innocence in desiring war cannot be forced down our throats. It is now our turn to say "to a finish!"

WHILE Turkey was still neutral, one peaceful morning not a single vehicle was to be found upon the streets of the city. The thoroughfares were as quiet as death; a most curious sensation passed over one, for during the night every stable had been entered by soldiers and every horse commandeered.

Consecutively came the mobilizing of all troops. Usually, when drafts were required, mounted soldiers raided the villages and brought them in under escort, but now a sort of terror was at once instilled, and hundreds of thousands of drafts came in, unescorted, daily; each group clapping, dancing and singing to keep their courage up. They were followed by their women-folk, crying, screaming the death cry, tearing their hair and clothes. The largest number of them passed our house. It was a heart-rending sight, but it is worse to think of their later fate.

All the while Turkey boasted her neutrality. Our suspicions at last became realities when, one morning, we noticed the Russian and French flags, at their respective consulates, had been exchanged for those of the nations which had taken over their interests. I believe the British flag disappeared shortly after.

Upon the heels of war came the moratorium, and banks suspended payments. Nothing had any value but money, real coin. Wheat was a drug on the market and could hardly be sold. It was not long before the case changed entirely. Money has had less value since, especially when compared with the necessities of life, and wheat has sold for prices never before dreamed of. According to last accounts, in Damascus, where food is normally very cheap, gold coin equivalent to $2.50 will only purchase six pounds of bread. Before the British came, a pair of shoes sold here for $70—Turkish paper currency. Thank God, everything can now be had at comparatively reasonable prices. But I have gone ahead of my story, and I must not go too much into detail.

Now it was rumored that Turkey was going to make an attack on the Suez Canal across the desert. All who knew the desert scorned the idea, but soon it became evident that the rumor was a fact. Having no railroad from the north, south of Samaria, all the transportation had to be done overland by wagons, but mostly camels were used. All these endless caravans, also troops and artillery, passed our house in endless procession, mostly at night. At first the animals were lovely to look at, fat and in good condition. The camels from Asia Minor, with hair on the neck, almost touching the ground, were especially attractive. But it was not long before they were lean from starvation

also were half starved. One picture I shall never forget. It was an old gray-haired man (one could hardly call them soldiers, as all army service corps were still wearing their own civilian clothes of every description). He was tugging away at a string of camels that could hardly move. His head never turned this way or that, but keeping his eyes riveted upon the road before him he constantly muttered, in a low voice, as he went on, "O Creator, hasten death." Doubtless his prayer has long since been answered.

THE attack on the canal developed, and you know the result. It may perhaps interest you to learn that, according to careful calculation, it cost a camel fourteen days' work to land one fifteen-pound shell at the guns before the canal from the railroad head at Samaria, and that fifty-four thousand camels and other animals died during this expedition. Every particle of food which the camel was to eat, also the food for its driver, had thus to be carried. No wonder that every available animal was seized. But it did not end here, for soldiers too were used as beasts of burden. Each two had to carry a telephone pole of considerable size and a big sack of biscuits all the way from Jerusalem to Beersheba and keep it up, week after week. Those unable to lift the burdens alone had no other course than to load their women with them.

About this time the American Red Cross of Washington sent a mission from Beirut with Dr. Ward at the head of it, with assistants and nurses to equip a tent hospital of two hundred beds. The American Colony did what they could to assist in the preparations and went along into the desert as far as Hafir el Angah. It was one of the best outfits possible to get together, and practically all the wounded passed through its clean and hospitable ten wards. Lack of government transportation delayed our advance. This proved to be a blessing in disguise, for the day the hospital started to push forward from Hafir el Angah, the Turks attempted to blow up the canal.

I shall never forget that experience, when, with the Turks in full retreat, half the Red Cross party of doctors, nurses and equipment pushed forward that day in a caravan of many thousands of camels, mostly loaded with telegraph poles, wire and hospital equipment. At nightfall they had begun falling back on Hafir, unloading, then reloading with food and ammunition, and by midnight not an animal remained except those dying and dead about the camp. I hate to recall those experiences. Most of the Turkish camels we loaded with our own hands that day with Red Cross supplies. The camels had backs in such a condition that the blood and pus ran from them in streams the full length of their long legs the moment the burdens were fixed to the saddles.

Thus passed the first attack upon the canal. Although defeated, the scheme was not given up. Instead, railroads and wagon roads must be built and were built; but they cost the lives of twenty thousand human beings, due to hunger, thirst and rampant disease. Men have told me how, during one night, half the occupants of their tent died of typhus fever.

The military side developed along these lines until the British occupation, with the exception that German officers and influence became daily more prominent, till the army came under direct German control and German motor trucks took the place of the dead camels. But what will interest you will be the civil side, and in order to picture this to you more clearly, the foregoing sketch is necessary.

AS the war developed, call after call went out for more troops, until every male from seventeen to fifty was supposed to be in the army. The various classes which originally had enjoyed exemption had to join up or pay an exemption tax of $250. This paid exemption was supposed to be for the duration of the war, but it was not, and periodically had to be renewed. When the paper currency dropped so low in value, money was no longer accepted for exemption. Instead, certain quantities of cereals were demanded, and because of the high prices, the exemption for one year often cost $500 gold and more. Think what it cost those like the Bethlehemites, who got their funds from abroad, paid in paper notes which has fallen to one-third and even one-fourth their face value. Women disposed of their jewelry for next to nothing in order to buy out a brother, son, or husband. Men sold houses, lands and gardens only to escape military service for one, two, or three years, and then they had to serve, for all their worldly possessions had melted away. All that these men left behind were large families of impoverished women and children with no means of earning a living. Our coachman, for example, was supporting a large family, as his two older brothers had been drafted. We paid his first exemption tax and were unable to renew it. When he was forced into the army, he left a brother, fifteen years old, who was also soon taken, leaving sixteen helpless women at home, who fell upon us for the necessities of life. The more the government called for troops the more men deserted, and every deserter made a demand for a new recruit.

A locust plague also swept the land. This helped to make things worse, for the whole of the fruit crop was ruined.

Thus we found ourselves with poverty and disease growing rapidly. About this time we received a remittance from the Christian Herald of New York, of $2500. It was used in industrial relief. Women and girls made handsome needle lace and earned good wages as long as the thread was available and the money held out. The lace is now being sold and the money reinvested in the work, while the profits are being used to purchase ration tickets which are given to the destitute lace workers, so that, besides the pay they get for making the lace, they also receive all profits in the form of food tickets. There are several hundred already at work. Since the British occupation the Christian Herald has sent another remittance of $10,000, which likewise is being used to run a lace industry, and this promises to be a great blessing to the poor girls. The main object is to keep them out of sin and enable them to earn a decent living.

BUT to go back again: Our front door was crowded all day long and we shared our mouthful as long as we could, making soup for the destitute and feeding those who had been used to better things from our own table. Thousands at this time died of slow starvation and disease, notably from typhus fever, which contagion is carried by vermin. Many poor persons who came to our door dropped on the road and were attended to by our women until life left them, in spite of the fact that they were alive with deadly vermin. Next these bodies had to be buried, while others had to be gotten into hospitals, the only means being our vehicles. Three of our members caught the hideous disease in this way, but, thank God, all pulled through.

It was just at this stage that the timely help came from you in the form of the gifts of money sent by those who, wishing to do a kindly act, could not then, and cannot even now, fully realize what it meant to thousands of starving people. Nor can they realize inevitable breaking off of relations between Turkey and the United States. After this actually happened, but before we knew it, the wounded, one day, poured into Jerusalem and only found inadequate nursing. There was no other humanitarian course to take but to volunteer to nurse. How many passed through our hands here, God only knows; their name is legion. It was thus that we came into contact with the British wounded, whom we always sent to our hospitals, so that we might give them such special care and sympathy as lay in our power. This almost ended in the deportation of the whole Colony. We felt the iron fist of might, of which I will soon tell you.

At first, the wounded came from the advance field hospital run by the Turkish National Red Crescent. These gentlemen had considerable ability as surgeons and a good deal of conscience and interest in humanity. After the demoralization of the army at Beersheba and Gaza, the wounded were sent in from the small field hospitals, wounds in a deplorable condition, alive with worms and in cases not attended to for days. Next, as the battle wheeled around to Mizpah or Neby Samuel, we became, as it were, behind the lines, and wounded were received, soaked in blood, but a few hours after being wounded.

BEFORE ending my story, I must tell you of our experience with the iron fist. Shortly before the British offensive took place, the control of the army was changed from Turkish to German hands. One day, when our hospitals were full, the wards neat and clean as a pin, and the nurses doing their duty, a certain general, Falken-heyn's head doctor, walked into the hospital. He was all of iron. He tried to find fault with various things, but could not. It was quite plain, however, that he thought it unwise to trust the British prisoners to us. Finally he ascertained Mrs. Vester's nationality (as we were speaking to him), and went away. Before long we were ordered to close the hospital. We knew what that meant, but fortunately, by the very next day the British had broken through at Gaza, and the Germans were the first to leave Jerusalem. Immediately our hospitals were refilled and remained so until the 30th of December, when the British relieved us of the last patient.

But this was not all. Interwoven with the last mentioned episode came first the order for the exiling of the whole Colony, because the Germans wanted our pigs. No sooner had that difficulty been gotten over, than we were told that our horses were to be commandeered for artillery purposes. The head Turkish doctor would not allow this, as they were continually used for Red Crescent purposes. The climax came with the order that all of the Americans of military age must be deported. We therefore packed our clothes, and the women put up a lunch for us. Where we were to go no one knew. Just at this critical moment, only about five days before the British took the city, Ali Pasha, the Turkish general in charge of the troops, visited our hospitals and was so pleased with what he saw that he disobeyed the order of General Falkenheyn and gave us passes to remain; in fact, his head doctor, the night of the retreat from Jerusalem, put all of the hospitals into our care. As the Turks retreated, they took as many of the wounded with them as possible. Many, on crutches, walked to Nablous, where lorries and wagons took the rest. The British prisoners, of course, were the first to be sent, but toward the end we received two new cases captured near Jerusalem, which with a third, who had been in hospital six months, comprised all the Tommies left in Jerusalem.

We cannot close this letter without expressing our deepest gratitude for your untiring energies in our belief and for the true Christian spirit which permeated all your endeavors. We are indeed blessed in the possession of the many friends who, through the efforts of yourself and others, have made it possible for us to live and carry on the work of humanity through these awful years. To all of you and them we are profoundly grateful, and we thank you from the bottom of our hearts.

The Mayor of Jerusalem (x), escorted by a squad bearing the white flag, meeting the British outpost to initiate arrangements for the surrender of the Holy City what it meant to us, for how could we have stood seeing their misery without being able to extend a helping hand? Many women brought their babies and offered to sell them for a pittance just to be sure of a few more meals. One mother left her twin skeleton babies hanging at midnight on our front gate. Just as these generous contributions, through your unrelenting energies, were about coming to an end, Mr. Crane of the Armenian and Syrian Relief Fund sent us $5,000, for which draft we were able to secure 450 gold English pounds, less than one-half face value. Still it was far more profitable than accepting paper currency and purchasing with it. With this sum we were able to distribute 184,854 portions of soup and beans, 7,633 pounds of bread, and 7,179 full meals to the destitute.

All these funds being more than used, the Almighty opened up other doors. The Khaskie Sultan soup kitchen was put into our hands. The Palestine and Syrian Relief Fund soon made its appearance. Some seventeen of our young folks are working in it. Industrial work is being given as well as food, clothes, etc. Besides this, the new government is selling rations to all and feeding free all refugees, so that it can be truthfully stated that no one need be hungry, though thousands are still destitute as a result of the war.

BUT to go back a little to another phase of what we passed through: With the declaration of war between our country and Germany came the

Gray Hairs No Bar to Service

By VICTOR T. J. GANNON
Manager, Employers' Association of Chicago

[NOTE. The Bureau of which the author is manager was organized January 25, 1917, by the Employers' Association of Chicago. There is no other like it in the world. It is bringing the middle-aged and old man into his own again and dispelling the almost criminal curse put upon old age by the Doctor Osler theory.]

"THEY say you can find work for old men." There was doubt in the voice, yet a gleam of hope in the eyes of the white-haired, pale and ragged man who stood before me. He stood straight and looked me in the eyes—I noticed that first of all.

"You are not old," I told him, with a cheerful smile. He returned the smile, but weakly.

"I have been told for years, wherever I sought employment, that I was too old—"

"You won't be insulted if I suggest a shave and haircut and—"

"Oh, no; I realize that I need all of that, but I cannot—"

"We will attend to that," I told him. The man, he was a few years over fifty, was given a shave and haircut, a new outfit, clean linen, clothes pressed, a luncheon, a cold shower to brighten him up, and was sent to the office of a certain big manufacturing concern. That was in February, 1917. Four months later, in June, a handsome man, rather stout, ruddy, well dressed, stepped up to my desk.

"I can give employment to four men," he said, "men of middle age, say fifty."

"I can get them for you," I told him, and began talking about his requirements. Then I agreed to send the men over and continue to send them until he had selected the four he needed.

"You do not remember me?" he asked.

"Perhaps you have been in here before, looking for men to work for you—"

"I was in here once before, looking for—a job," he told me.

IT was the ragged, gray and pale man who, four months before, had come to me and asked if I could find work for an "old man." It was difficult to recognize him. He told me most of his story and from the concern where he worked I got the rest of it. He was started at $15 a week. Before the week was up they found that he was especially well fitted for an executive position, that he knew men and could handle them. In four months' time his salary had been increased to $50 a week and he was in charge of a department with many men under him. I did not see him after that, but heard from him from time to time, and found positions for several men in his department, and when we made our first annual report I found that he was one of the $3,000-a-year men.

I do not wish to give the impression that every one of the nine thousand four hundred and forty-four men between the ages of forty-five and seventy-nine that our Employment Bureau placed in good positions did as well as this man. Naturally it is not to be expected; but many of them did, and all of them are doing better, earning more and are more contented and happy than they ever expected or hoped to be.

Our Association started this work of finding positions for men forty-five years of age and older before we got into the war. We knew from past experience that the few men of these years whom we managed to land in positions had proved extremely valuable to their employers. We knew also the pitiful state of affairs—the great number of men of gray hairs who, although competent, could not get work because they were considered too old. After we took up this work of finding employment for such men, there came the war, the departure of so many young men and the need for men to take their places.

THERE is plenty of work in this country for young and old alike, but in Chicago the big employers will never again hold the erroneous opinion that once prevailed that a young man was worth two old men. They now know that the so-called old man has a value that the young man does not possess—contentment, stability, desire to hold his position and ambition to gain promotion, no desire to rove about, no splitting of the twenty-four hours into so many hours for business and so many for social pleasures, and, above all else, an experience and soundness of judgment that only years can bring to a man.

The Employers' Association of Chicago is made up of most of the more important business men of the city who must depend upon a considerable number of employes. On January 25, 1917, this association took over from the Committee of Unemployment the work of securing, gratuitously, positions for worthy, needy men past forty-five years of age.

Here are some figures from our first annual report:

Employers asking for the service of our Employment Bureau.....	961
Orders from these employers.....	5,315
Number of men they required.....	12,292
Number of men 45 and over we sent out.....	13,095
Number of men 45 and over securing good positions.....	9,444

It was natural that not every man we sent out was fitted for the positions. We made as close a study as possible of every man and endeavored at first to fit him to the position, but soon we learned that we must fit the position to the man. That is, when a certain position was open we searched for the man best fitted to fill it, rather than to attempt to make any applicant fit that position.

THE cost of our Employment Bureau for the year in placing these 9,444 men in good positions was only $12,549.66. This made the cost per capita of every man hired $1.33. In other words, at a cost of only one dollar and thirty-three cents we placed some worthy and capable man, always forty-five years or over, and from that up to seventy-nine years, in a permanent and good paying position.

More than six hundred cases of actual destitution were remedied by placing some of the registrants where money was paid daily, in part or whole, until the destitution was relieved, thereby making for direct, instantaneous relief and permanent regeneration.

While our chief efforts are directed to finding good employment for so-called "old men," and we print conspicuously on our letter-head: "Positions Secured Gratuitously for Worthy Men Past 45 Years of Age," we do find positions for men under that age, charging absolutely no fee in any instance. But we do not record this work. We have no record of men under forty-five or the positions we find for them. When we have requisitions from employers wanting men of technical training and we find it impossible to fill such requisitions with men past middle age, we take on younger men. But even here we do not take on the younger men unless the employer shows that he is using older men wherever possible. We make no charges whatsoever to applicants or to employers, whatever age the applicants may be.

THIS Employment Bureau is the only one of its kind in the world. We specialize in "old men," we study the men and help make them presentable. We strive to find positions for which they are best fitted, to find positions near their homes, to encourage them and help them in every manner possible.

We do not consider "any old job" as good enough for gray-haired men, for men from forty-five to seventy-nine. There are many "blind alley" jobs, where old men may earn a meager living. We do not put our applicants there. Many old men in the cities throughout the country who are unfortunate, struggle along as dish-washers, errand boys, cleaners in office buildings and factories and similar "jobs" of that sort. The positions we give our men are never of that sort. There isn't a "blind alley" job in one of the 9,444 we got for elderly men last year. Their positions offer opportunities for advancement and our old men have not disappointed us—almost without exception every one of the almost ten thousand has had his pay raised, some who were walking the streets looking for any sort of work last winter are today earning $3,000 and still going strong. Our Association is rightfully proud of its first year's work, and especially of the splendid concerns using our service.

There are always doubters. For a long while the opinion prevailed that the old man was of no use. "Young blood" was the slogan. Many a concern has advertised, "We need young men worth $10,000 a year." Few young men are worth that much. Many old men are.

Take our old men that we put into jobs last year—9,444 of them. A year ago they were without employment, every employer would look at their gray hairs and either softly turn them down or bluntly say "too old," yet those men during the past twelve months earned more than two million dollars!

HUNDREDS of men from distant cities, learning of our success, have sent in applications, begging us to find employment for them, all of these being more than forty-five years of age. Our daily average for the year was 300 applicants for work under the age of forty-five, turned away because they were not old enough. The seating capacity of the applicants' room in our Bureau is 300. Every day of the year the 300 seats were filled and 300 more were standing. But a great many of the 600 daily applicants were well under our minimum age limit of forty-five. We have no maximum limit. Last year the oldest man to get a steady job was seventy-nine, and he is still hale and hearty and on the job every day—one of the happiest men in Chicago.

Our Bureau has made such healthy strides and the results have proved so beneficial to both employee and employer, that many people in other cities are investigating and it is probable—and to be devoutly hoped—that similar Employment Bureaus will be established in all of the great cities of the country. Individually a number of men throughout the country are striving to help men past forty-five to good positions. Many Y. M. C. A.'s are doing a little.

Faith in the value of men past forty-five is rapidly growing. The day of the man past middle-age is coming back. Years ago the man past middle age was believed to be the only capable man. Youth was of itself a bar to rapid promotion. Then things changed and the young man was held to be the only one of value in a business. Now we know that the young man has his certain value and his place, but that the elderly man does not deserve to be thrown in to the discard and must not be.

THE employers of the country are beginning to wake up to the fact that the man past forty-five is a valuable asset. The elderly man is slowly coming back into his own. Employers throughout the country are beginning to look for gray-haired men to fill steady and responsible positions. They are learning to value the gray-haired man, learning to value his services, his trustworthiness and his constant plugging that achieves far more than the sporadic spurts of the younger man.

Lloyd George Assents to Action in Siberia

ADDRESSING the House of Commons, on August 7, Premier David Lloyd George reviewed the services of Great Britain to the Allied cause. The Americans, he said, have already a powerful army, a tried army and a victorious army in France. [Cheers.] Equal to the best troops in the field and growing every day. There will be no break in the increase of that army until America will have an army not far short, if at all, of the German army itself. [Cheers.] On the other hand Germany can never maintain the same number of divisions. They are now begging for Austrian support. Rather humiliating for the great German army which was to destroy the Allied armies by May. He declared that Russia had become a great disappointment to Germany and a tangle to her feet. He gave his full assent to the action of the United States and Japan in sending forces to Vladivostok to rescue the Czecho-Slovaks from the plight they had been put into by German and Bolshevik intrigue. Regarding peace he said: "There are people who seem to consider any effort to make peace in itself dishonorable and treason to their country. That attitude must be steadfastly discouraged." He declared his belief that some German statesmen intended to negotiate at Brest-Litovsk a peace which would have been fair according to their minds, but that the military command had imposed the humiliating and drastic peace upon Russia, and that the next step was the imposing of the humiliating and enslaving peace upon Rumania. He held the reception of von Kuehlmann's speech in the Reichstag as additional evidence that the present powers in Germany were not ready to make a peace which would satisfy the conscience of the world, and he warned against any league of nations which would be so constituted that Germany could dominate it by the clanking of her sword. He said that peace must be durable. "To be durable it must be just; it must be more: there must be a power behind it—a power that can enforce its decrees. When you have demonstrated to the enemy that such a power does exist, durable peace will then come, but no sooner."

A Week in the World's News

RECONSTITUTING RUSSIA. It was announced, on August 7, that Major-Gen. W. S. Graves was to command the force of 6,000 or 7,000 American troops in the Siberian expedition. The Japanese troops will be under the command of Gen. Kikuzo Otani, a full general, who, by virtue of his rank, will be the commander-in-chief of the expedition. Gen. Otani is a fighting man of large experience, having entered both the army and matrimony in 1879. He was a staff officer during the China-Japan war, commanded a brigade in the Russo-Japan war, and has recently been in command of the Japanese forces at Tsing-Tao. The British and French were also expecting to send small detachments of troops. The American, French and British troops which were landed at Archangel were reported, on August 8, to have advanced 100 miles along the railroad from Archangel to Volgda, driving back German and Russian forces. The Allied diplomatic representatives had, on August 8, returned to Archangel. Trotzky and Lenine were reported as threatening to declare war on Japan, Great Britain and France.

The British representatives at Vladivostok and Archangel made public, on August 9, a declaration of the British government declaring to the people of Russia the benevolent purpose of their Allies. The Bolsheviks arrested the British and French Consuls at Moscow and Great Britain retaliated by hold-

PESTERING THE PRESIDENT. Notwithstanding the fact that President Wilson has almost exceeded his executive prerogative in his efforts to advance the cause of Suffrage, the Militant Suffragists in Washington, on August 6, marched to the White House with banners, one of which bore the legend, "We

American shipyards in July launched 123 ships of 631,944 tons. The total launchings in neutral and allied shipyards in the three months ending June 30th was 1,243,274 tons, 296,696 tons more than the losses by U-boats. Premier Lloyd George in an address to the Commons said that the British toll of submarines had reached at least 150.

PACKERS AGAIN ACCUSED. On August 5 a Federal Grand Jury in New York returned indictments against the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., Armour & Co., Swift & Co. and the Jersey City Stock Yards Company, charging them with conspiracy to violate the Federal Law against rebates. On August 8 the Federal Trade Commission made public a report which had been in the hands of the President since July 3, in which the five great packing houses, Armour & Co., Morris & Co., Wilson & Co., Swift & Co. and the Cudahy Packing Co., were charged with monopoly, unfair competition and profiteering. The commission recommended as a remedy for the packing situation the taking over by the government and operation in the public interest of stock yards, refrigerator lines, cattle cars and branch houses now owned or controlled by the packing interests. All of the packing companies issued statements denying the charges of the commission. J. Ogden Armour said, "The United States government can have Armour & Co. and their employees and officials if needed." Edward A. Cudahy declared that from every dollar received by the packers 90 cents went to the live stock raisers, and that of the 10 cents remaining 8 cents was spent in processes of manufacture and distribution.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. Replying in the Commons to an inquiry by John Dillon, Nationalist leader, Mr. Shortt, Secretary for Ireland, announced that the government was working on a Home Rule bill which he felt would be likely to pass the House. He announced also that the government would seize 150,000 rifles in the hands of the Ulsterites, and that "if the government could get them without trouble so much the better."

On August 8 all recruiting for the army, navy and marine corps was suspended pending the passage of the new man-power bill. PRESIDENT SAYS DIG. President Wilson, on August 11, made a public appeal to coal operators and miners to work together to insure coal supplies for the coming winter. He said that victory might depend on fuel and that many homes might suffer if coal enough were not taken out. He urged miners to work every day and operators and their Several women tried to speak, and 48 of them were taken to police court, charged with making speeches without a police permit.

The Unharmful Cross

OFTEEN along the ruined trail of war a wayside cross has stood unharmed, a witness to that living faith which grows stronger under affliction and which sees heaven clearer through this hell of war. In next week's issue Dr. Joel Byron Slocum brings the message of "The Unharmful Cross."

Perhaps you never followed the canvas in summer or hungered in winter when the summer's earnings had been squandered. But you have all suffered, you have all had days of victory, you have all loved and you have all found sorrow and happiness very much mixed up together. You will find all of this in the "King of the Shillibers," a story in two parts by George Gilbert. The first part comes next week.

The Great Allied Drive in Picardy

WE'RE smashing through!" Thus did Premier Lloyd George of Britain greet the first intelligence of the new drive of the Allies against the armies of the Kaiser. The Battle of Picardy, hinging upon that of the Marne, extended the fighting line all the way from Rheims to Ypres, with steady and decided Allied advances at every point. The Picardy offensive has been a smashing Allied-American victory, resulting, by August 11, in the taking of 36,000 prisoners and 500 guns, the destruction of all the Somme bridges between Peronne and Ham, a distance of fifteen miles, and an advance to positions threatening Chaulnes, the chief German base, Lassigny, Roye and even Noyon. A decisive event was the German evacuation of Montdidier, which has been the center of the summer's fighting, and the Allied advance ten miles beyond.

On Thursday morning, August 8, just at dawn, the British, Australian and Canadian troops facing the Germans from Morlancourt, south of Albert, to Hangard, east of Amiens, without preliminary artillery preparation, but with a sweeping barrage ahead of them and hundreds of the new light tanks known as "whippets," in the line with them, left their trenches and overran the positions of the Germans along the whole front of attack. A little later the French went into action from Hangard to Moreuil, north of Montdidier.

The morning was foggy and misty and the Germans were taken completely by surprise and their line was ruptured south of the Somme. Allied cavalry, charging through, swept on ahead of the infantry, rounding up columns of the then retreating Huns, destroying long lines of transports, taking villages and even coralling a whole brigade staff. There was a rumor that one of the whippets had been seen chasing a German general down a road, but the end of the race was not reported. By three P. M. the infantry had advanced seven miles toward the important railroad and highway center of Chaulnes, and the average depth of the advance was about five miles over the whole twenty-five mile front. In the center there was practically no resistance, the limit of the advance being the ability of the infantry to press forward. On both flanks the resistance was immediate and in considerable force, the Germans fighting hard for Moreuil and Morisel on the Avre, north of Montdidier, and also for Morlancourt and the Chipilly spur south of Albert. The French took the two towns on the Avre after sanguinary fighting. The British took Morlancourt and Chipilly, but lost them both on Friday as the Germans counter-attacked. On Saturday American troops came into line with the British, running the last lap of the way in order to get there in time for the fight, and the British-American attack on Saturday put Morlancourt, Chipilly and the heights southward to the Somme safely behind the Allied line.

On Thursday the captures of prisoners were so large as to embarrass the British and it was necessary to send thousands of prisoners back from the battle under guard of slightly wounded Tommies. By evening of Friday the English prison-pens were overfull and more were still coming.

ON Friday the Germans threw in reserve divisions and managed to organize a semblance of resistance to the they practically surrounded and soon took Montdidier, and with it a considerable force of German prisoners and many guns.

By the evening of Saturday, August 10, the Germans were on the run everywhere south of the Somme, the Allies had taken over 24,000 prisoners and more than 400 guns, some of them heavy pieces, mounted on railway

General March, Chief of Staff, U.S.A., said in Washington on August 10, that General Foch had the Germans "on the run," and that he was working on the sound principle, "that when you get an enemy going you keep him going; never give him a chance to recuperate or think it over; keep on hitting him!" General March implied also that the reason for the plan to extend the draft ages and increase the American army was that our forces might be constantly available in sufficient strength to keep the enemy on the run. He cautioned the correspondents also not to conclude that, because the Germans were just now being badly whipped, they were already beaten and the war was soon to end. He was unable to give the identity of the American troops which had been rushed to the support of the British at Morlancourt and Chipilly.

ON Sunday, August 11, the Germans brought up fresh divisions and counter-attacked desperately against the British, French and American troops. North of the Somme, the British and Americans pressed forward to Dervancourt half way from Morlancourt to Albert and swept down the slopes toward Bray on the Somme. South of the Somme the British advanced but little, being occupied all day in repulsing German counter-

English who were driving at Chaulnes and the French pressing toward Roye; but the Allied troops gained five miles more, forcing the bulge of a new salient well into the former German salient and threatening Montdidier with envelopment. By evening English guns were within range of Chaulnes and the only railroad out of the salient was under fire. Captures of men and guns by the Allies were increased and the disorganization of the enemy made more complete while cavalry and tanks were still well in advance of the Allied infantry, which was pressing forward with comparatively small losses, except at the two wings of the drive where fierce fighting continued.

In this advance the Allied flying corps again rendered invaluable service. Flying low, they bombed and machine-gunned troops, transports, ammunition dumps and traffic centers. They destroyed some of the bridges over the Somme and damaged others. On this first day of the "Surprise Drive," as it has been dubbed, the Allied flyers downed sixty-five enemy machines, but because of their low flying and consequent damage by fire from the ground, they themselves lost fifty machines. On Friday the British downed sixty-one enemy planes, losing twenty-three themselves.

On Saturday, the British and French driving eastward, swept further toward the important German bases of Chaulnes and Roye. French cavalry scouts were reported as having entered Chaulnes. The French First Army, holding the line from Montdidier eastward toward the Oise, north of Compiègne, drove northward, completely overwhelming the Germans facing it and reaching Faverolles, east of Montdidier, before noon. Pressing ahead, trucks. These captures were increased by Sunday evening to 36,000 prisoners and 500 guns. The battle had become one of extreme movement, and it was not apparent whether the Germans would attempt to stand west of the Somme, or return to the line from Peronne, southward along the Somme through Ham to Noyon, from which they retreated when they drew back to the Hindenburg line. In three days' fighting they had lost eleven divisions, either completely through captures or by casualties sufficient to destroy them as fighting units. The Germans had lost all their artillery along a wide front, and were completely outfought in the air. Foch's hammer blows—coupled with constant pressure north of the Vesle, where French and American troops were steadily improving their positions and constantly extending their front and strengthening their numbers—were putting in jeopardy the fateful 21st of March.

Already in three days the Allies had made greater gains than had resulted from any three days' fighting by either side thus far in the war, since the first battle of the Aisne in September 1914. The first day's penetration exceeded the gains of the Germans on March 21, the captures of men and guns were greater and the enemy's discomfiture and disorder exceeded those of General Gough's army on March 21 and 22. The three days' fighting had also freed Amiens from the menace of German long-range guns and had restored to Allied use the main railway from Paris to Amiens, which important artery, capable of carrying 100 trains a day, had been under fire from the Germans near Montdidier and along the Avre.

attacks which were particularly strong north and south of Lihons. At one time the Germans penetrated well into the British positions, but before nightfall the line was fully restored and had been pushed ahead slightly.

To the southward the French forged ahead against fierce resistance, gaining nearly three miles in the territory between the Avre and the Oise, coming within attacking distance of Roye and, through the taking of important heights, threatening Lassigny and Noyon.

The Germans appeared to be attempting a stand along the line of Chaulnes, Nesle, and Noyon, but air observers reported dense columns of German troops and transport moving eastward along all roads.

The Germans on Sunday attacked the American and French troops north of the Vesle. The attacks were all repulsed and prisoners were taken.

On Tuesday, August 13, a number of fresh divisions had been thrown into the fighting on the Somme front in Picardy, with the purpose of retarding the speed of the Allied advance. The Allies, however, continued to make gains on both flanks of the German line, and made advances along a 35-mile front, the center proving firm in the face of repeated German counter-attacks. Unofficial reports were current that Roye had been evacuated by the Germans, and that the fall of Lassigny, one of the important Hun bases, was imminent, and would probably be followed by a German retirement on a large scale.

Large numbers of prisoners continue to pass to the rear of the Allies, showing the crippling of many German divisions. The total captured since the beginning of the Picardy drive is now estimated at in excess of 40,000 men, with 700 cannon and innumerable machine guns.

Is the World "Getting Religion"?

IT is gratifying to note that in a very large and steadily increasing number of our churches, the outlook for a world-wide fusion of Christian organizations is now being taken up as a topic of overshadowing interest. Many pastors are sanguine that such a fusion is on the way. Others discuss it tentatively, but hopefully. Only a few among those ministers who represent the progressive religious spirit of the times, are reluctant to recognize the change.

One point is especially noticeable in almost all the deliverances on the subject. All are agreed that a new and a nobler vision of service has come to the nations in these four years. They are getting nearer to God. They have a clearer perception of His presence and a larger thought of the Omnipotence that is mightier than all of earth's armies, and which can humble or exalt the nations at will. Their spiritual eyes are opened, and, like the servant of the prophet of old, they feel the presence of the mighty forces that stand ready to execute the divine purposes on the earth, and to bring victorious reinforcement to those who are humble, obedient and faithful.

But the recognition of change in the minds of men, on the reality of which so many ministers are laying particular emphasis at the present time, would be valueless unless it included a perception of our own imperfections and revealed to us how far we have fallen short of that obedience which it is our duty to render. When we know our own shortcomings and seek earnestly to have them forgiven and remedied, we are on the way to "get religion." Yet it is only the beginning.

One of the leading Philadelphia pastors, Rev. David M. Steele, of the Church of St. Luke and the Epiphany, has this pertinent passage in a recent sermon: "The Church is many, as the waves; religion is one, as the sea. If that is the case, all profitable study of this subject must begin by utterly ignoring such distinctions as that between creeds and cults and sects, those manifold denominational divisions—both minor and major. . . . Either all may stand or all will fall. Either we shall be plunged into materialism, or we are about to recognize ourselves anew as, all together, bound with golden chains about the feet of God." Dr. Steele with many others holds that the years of war have tended to the strengthening of all that makes religion real. Not only is religion not dead, but he sees it vibrant with new life and resonant with the words of the Master.

All great transformations come slowly. The broadening view, which is to level our religious distinctions and bring us nearer to the ideal Christian world-family, will grow as time passes. Meanwhile, we can take heart of grace and give thanks to God for the victory he has sent us and for the still greater victory that is coming—not only victory on the battlefields against those who would tyrannize the world, but in the hearts of men everywhere. God's program for the redemption of the race and the elevation of humanity, however hindered or delayed, cannot be side-tracked or defeated. Its triumphant completion is assured, and Christians both in and out of the Church, by their confident and hearty cooperation can hasten the triumph.

The Eighteen-to-Forty-five Draft

THE request of Secretary Baker for an amendment to the Draft Law changing the age limits from twenty-one and thirty-one to eighteen and forty-five is believed to portend that the Allies are preparing for an offensive on a large scale.

It is pointed out in Washington that in June Secretary Baker said there was no need to look beyond the present age limits then or in the near future, but explained that if changing the draft ages would hasten the winning of the war there would be no hesitancy in recommending it.

It is understood that the present battle in France has had much to do with speeding up plans for the prosecution of the war to a successful end. It is apparent that the recent turn of affairs on the western front has scrapped many well-laid defensive plans of the Allies and made change to aggressive policy necessary.

The belief that the Allies are getting ready to make smashing drives against the Germans next spring and summer is general in Washington, London, and Paris. It is predicted that there will be drives on two or three fronts. The Americans will help the French in France, as they are doing now, and the Italians in Italy and in Albania, where their offensive is striking at the back door of Austria. At the same time Secretary Baker has made it known that an army of less than 1,000,000 trained and equipped men will be retained at home.

There is much interest in the probable number of new registrants that will be found physically qualified to bear arms. The present physical requirements will stand in the new draft, having been worked out with a view to what modern warfare demands, and not necessarily what will produce the greatest number of soldiers.

The question of how far the country will go in demanding military service by the older men who will come under the new draft age limit is causing speculation. It is certain that, while exemption regulations will remain about the same as at present, there will not be the strict interpretation that has been placed upon them by some of the draft boards in the case of the younger men of the present draft.

Women Are Good Mechanics

ACCORDING to a report of the National Industrial Conference Board, women in war-time employment are showing a remarkable adaptability for machine-shop work. The report summarizes information obtained from 131 establishments employing 335,015 men and 49,823 women and including 10,657 women engaged in work formerly performed exclusively by men.

Their labor has ranged from the operation of drill presses and lathes to core-making, inspecting and assembling mechanical products and performing many precise machine operations. In the main it has been confined to the lighter processes requiring rapidity and dexterity, and in such work their output has proved equal to and frequently greater than that of male employees. This was notably true of women's work in automobile manufacture, and in a munitions plant manufacturing fuses, where women operatives on drill presses and milling machines were from 25 to 50 per cent. more rapid than men.

"In No Sense Militaristic"

IN a recent letter to an admirer President Wilson has hit the gold in his clear definition of the quality of supreme executive authority in the United States. His words should be widely published and read by all citizens.

An artist etched an imaginative portrait of the President in a military uniform, and sent him a proof. President Wilson's letter in reply illuminates the whole spirit of the American system of government, as follows:

"The framers of the Constitution, of course, realized that the President would seldom be a soldier, and their idea in making him the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States was that the armed forces of the country must be the instruments of the authority by which policy was determined. It is for that reason that we can so truly say that our organization is in no sense and can in no sense be militaristic."

Nothing could be more timely or desirable than this occasion, which the President has so acutely improved, for setting the form and substance of American governmental principles in a clear, strong light for all the world to see. The supremacy of the civil authority over the military in our country is to be taken for granted; but at a time when enemies are quick to mislead the ignorant by subtle falsehoods, the President has done the whole country a signal service by making this unmistakable statement of facts.

The March of Prohibition

THE House of Representatives at Washington had scarcely passed the National Prohibition Resolution before the State Legislatures began to ratify it. Mississippi was the first to claim the honor on January 8. Then followed Virginia, Kentucky, South Carolina, North Dakota, Maryland, Montana, Texas, Delaware, South Dakota by unanimous vote of both houses, Massachusetts, Arizona, and Georgia ratifying in each house on the same day, June 26, making 13 in less than six months' time. A special session of the Nebraska legislature was called, but its senate declared that the question of ratification had no right to be brought up, and hence refused to consider it. Only two states rejected ratification, Rhode Island and Louisiana. The amendment in the Legislature of Louisiana was passed overwhelmingly in the house, but was beaten by a tie vote in the senate. Governor Pleasant called a special session of the legislature for Aug. 5 for the ratification of the amendment. At the regular session there was a tie vote because a "dry" member of the legislature resigned and the one vote necessary to carry was lacking. The Governor ordered an election for a new member in that district, and another dry member was elected. The Governor and the other friends of prohibition say that Louisiana will ratify. If this should be the case, the liquor men would be dispirited, as it is the wettest state in the South, having been dominated by the liquor ring of New Orleans. It will be seen that five of the wet states have ratified, and Louisiana would make the sixth wet one out of the 14 voting, if it should ratify. Friends of prohibition predict that 36 of the states, the necessary three-fourths, will have ratified by a year from this time.

Charles Stelze, a Labor leader who thinks clearly and speaks in plain language, puts the case for Prohibition in this brief argument:

"We Americans spend $3,800 every minute of the day for booze. That's the price of a fairly comfortable home for the average workingman. Just think what it means to throw away a workingman's home every minute in the day for twenty-four hours! It means 1,440 homes every day! It means 535,600 homes every year! Counting five persons to a family, it means that nearly 3,000,000 persons could be comfortably housed on the amount we waste on drink every year."

There is the equivalent of a whole Congressional debate in this short statement, based on unimpeachable statistics. It should suffice to turn the scale in favor of ratification.

To Save 100,000 Children

IT is shown by the census of 1910 that 300,000 children under five years of age die annually in the United States. That is a terrible toll of child life. The enormity of the sacrifice is apparent when it is realized that a large proportion of these lives could be saved by better care, better food, more intelligent cherishing of childhood.

The Children's Bureau in Washington estimates that this useless sacrifice could be reduced by at least 100,000 lives—that 100,000 children could be raised to good and useful citizenship by the observance of rules of sanitation, of nourishment and of upbringing. The preliminary step in the work, as outlined by the Children's Bureau, is a survey of child life. This survey includes the weighing and measuring of more than 600,000 children in New York city. The results of the weighing and the measurements will be used as the basis for improved treatment of the young lives in whom the future of America is vested.

At a time of wholesale destruction like the present, the individual human life—the life that is spared by war—constitutes the most precious pledge of the future.

A Tribute to Heroism

THE American Army is distinguished from the French and the British by the thorough attention paid to matters of comfort and recreation. Our boys are well taken care of; every family in America can be certain of that. And do not doubt that this care and attention shows in their morale by a contagious enthusiasm and aggressive fighting spirit. I was in the fighting sector when they stormed Vaux, July 1, and I saw them at the business we trained them for. They are the finest group of men I have ever seen, and I am willing to laud up the boots of any one of them."

This tribute to the prowess of American fighting men in action was paid by Raymond B. Fosdick, Chairman of the War and Navy Departments Commissions on Training Camp Activities, who arrived in Washington a few days ago to make an official report to Secretary Baker upon American training camp activities in France and England. Mr. Fosdick added:

The millions of dollars which the American people have given to the organizations that are making life livable for our fellows "Over There" constitutes the nearest approach to our paying the unpayable debt which we owe them. It is hard to avoid superlatives in speaking of the way the Red Cross has handled the refugee problem or the manner in which, with General Petain's assistance, it is giving aid to the needy families of French poilus at the front. It has filled the heart of France. As for the moral conditions in our army abroad, they are excellent. Our soldiers and sailors are strong men, with their minds filled with the high purpose of winning the war. It is not a question of whether they are worthy of us and our traditions. The question is whether we, as a country, are worthy of them.

Those glorious young souls, by their heroism and dauntless spirit, have given a new luster to our nation's history. What a heritage of honor will be the roll of those who have spoiled the flower of the German hosts at the Marne and the Oureq, and who saved Rheims and turned the tide of the greatest struggle in history! Not America alone but the whole world will treasure the story of their fight to save civilization.

Fighting the Enemies Within

By FRED H. RINDGE

[EDITOR'S NOTE. Mr. Rindge, the author of this article, is Secretary for the Industrial Service Movement of the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations.]

OVER 40,000,000 men have been called to the colors of the nations at war. Nearly half of these are young men eighteen to twenty-five years of age. Try to think of 6,000,000 killed, and of at least 6,000,000 wounded very seriously. In one thirteen days' battle only 10,000 Russians out of 100,000 came back. This was due largely to lack of ammunition. Shall we see to it that industrial conditions are such that our boys will have plenty?

Imagine 6,000,000 prisoners, the majority of whom have all they can do to keep from going insane. Ernest Bicknell of the Red Cross states that if all the inhabitants of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan were suddenly thrown helpless upon the charity of the world, the resulting problem of philanthropy would be far less than the war has created in Europe. The war costs more in one day than all the missionary societies of the world spend in one year.

We in the United States have not begun to realize the sacrifices of giving. In Canada they are contributing toward war relief over $14 per capita per annum, while in the United States we are contributing about eighty cents per capita. Shall we not enter into the sufferings of Europe in fuller measure than this?

TO hasten the end we must fight the enemies within as well as overseas. I do not refer to "hyphenates" or disloyal citizens as much as to the very real social and industrial problems which, unsolved, mean a fearful loss in military efficiency and life itself.

We must beat Germany at the earliest possible moment. The victory of democracy will be delayed far longer than it should be if in our expanding national military policy we do not include an expanding social policy as well.

Let us look the facts in the face and act. Experts tell us that every minute an American life is lost by preventable disease. If the present general death rate is continued, over 6,000,000 American lives will be needlessly destroyed during the next ten years. Should we not fear this as much as the results of war? Over 3,000,000 people are continuously sick. In New York City alone there are about 44,000 people afflicted with tuberculosis, and probably 25,000 of these are spreading the plague without adequate medical attention or supervision.

After this war human life will be too precious to waste. In times of peace we kill more people in industry in the United States, proportionately, than Europe does. Will this be true in times of war, or shall we provide adequate safeguards and comprehensive safety instruction? There are at least 35,000 deaths, 500,000 serious accidents, 2,000,000 non-fatal accidents, and 3,000,000 cases of industrial illness in our country every year. It is fair to say that we kill a workman every sixteen minutes and injure one every sixteen seconds. This, in spite of our splendid safety-first movements.

What shall we say of more than 2,000,000 child laborers between ten and fifteen years of age? Can they ever make the best type of citizen soldiers? And shall we allow child labor greatly to increase because of the pressure for war output?

OPINION is current that wages are now very high. This is true in certain industries, but more than half our male workers are still earning less than $800 a year. Does any thinking person believe that these workers and their families can live under conditions which could possibly make for health, happiness and the highest efficiency? Yet, now above all times, we must have efficiency.

The Wisconsin Board of Industrial Education estimates that 87 per cent. of the children fourteen to sixteen years of age are in dead-end blind-alley jobs. There are about 725,000 boys in secondary schools at the present time. Are all these boys being grounded in the best principles of health, right living and moral character, which will make them worthy to defend their country's honor? The Visiting Nurses' Association in Chicago tells us that two-thirds of the delinquent children come from homes where dirty, ill-ventilated rooms predominate. A significant study made in Glasgow several years ago showed clearly the relation of housing to health. In one-room houses the average weight of boys was 52.6 and the height was 46.6; in two-room houses the average weight was 56.1 and height 48.1; in three-room dwellings 60.6 and 50.5 respectively, and in four-room homes 64.3 and 51.3. Which boys would probably become the best soldiers? Which the most useful citizens? We can make our own application.

No comment is needed on the long hours still existing in many of our industries. We have much to learn from England and France. England's investigations of her munitions and other industries reveal that even under the pressure of war, reasonable hours pay in efficiency, quality and amount of product. The remarkable reports of the British Health of Munition Workers Committee cannot be denied. For example, a group of men sizing fuses increased their hourly rate of output 22 per cent. and their total weekly output 10 per cent. when the average hours were decreased from 61.5 to 55.4. Similarly a group of women increased their product 23 per cent. when hours were lowered from 68.2 to 59.7. This rise in production was effected without any change of machinery, tools, raw material, or nature of operation. In a large munition plant of 36,000 employees the sickness rate of men working overtime was 5.5 per cent., as against 3.7 per cent. among those on double-shift.

Even from the standpoint of war efficiency alone, present standards of life and industry in America must be maintained, and wherever possible they must be raised. The President, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy and many others are urging this.

MUCH has been said about the "hyphenated American." No such problem exists in the countries of our Allies. There are today in the United States 15,000,000 foreign-born people, and about 20,000,000 more of foreign parentage—only about 4,000,000 foreign-born are voters. In the splendid words of the National Americanization Committee, "The nation has before it the tasks of translating American institutions to the foreign-born, of bringing American-born and foreign-born together, of making English the common language as it is the master-key to American opportunity and nationality, of reducing illiteracy, of establishing the American standard of living in the homes of all its peoples, of protecting ignorant and helpless immigrants, of assuring equality before the law, and of safeguarding women and children."

Any one who really knows America's foreign people realizes they are capable of loyalty which often puts some of us "native Americans" to shame. If proof were needed, witness the wonderful way they have subscribed to our Liberty Loans! We native Americans must be worthy if they are to be worthy of our rich heritage of citizenship. Yet as I visit the great National Army cantonments and see the thousands of men who can speak little or no English I realize more than ever the almost superhuman task before our army officers.

WHAT shall we say of present relations between capital and labor? Certainly we cannot believe that these relations are any better in this country than in England; yet England has been able to bridge the chasm only by herculean efforts. American labor seems to realize that from its point of view this is a particularly good time to strike. Certain employers also seem to think that war pressure offers a good excuse for the lowering of standards. Both sides are wrong, yet there is hope.

Note this: "All the predatory forces that menace the welfare of wage-earners do not come from employers. There exists among the workers and in the labor movement an element which is either misguided or is so depraved that it is willing to lead workers into unnecessary suffering and useless misery. There are both extremes in this element. Its highest fringe contains the irreconcilable impossibilists who think that nothing but revolution and destruction can right the wrongs of workers."

Sounds like a sane employer, does it not? As a matter of fact, this is taken from an editorial in the American Federationist, the official publication of the American Federation of Labor.

Or take this: "There is no way of permanently settling any great questions involving the welfare of humankind except on the basis of right and justice. Position, wealth, influence, laws are helpless as a means of establishing a rule for human conduct, unless supported by principles of justice and righteousness."

The speaker is not a labor leader, but Judge Elbert H. Gary, chairman of the Board of Directors of the United States Steel Corporation.

This is merely one of many evidences that the interests of employer and employee are not opposed, but are identical. They must realize this now, if never before, when common cause should unite both parties in industry. After all, democracy must come in the shop before it can be realized in the nation. Employer and employee with the help of the interested public must decide on the details. This war may inevitably lead to workers having a larger voice in management. If this is to be, why wait for disastrous strikes to bring it about?

The National Civic Federation estimates that if the efficiency of 10,000,000 workers could be raised from even 25 per cent. to 50 per cent., $35,560,000,000 would be added to United States wealth. Mr. W. W. Alexander of the General Electric Company investigated a dozen factories and discovered a loss of $831,000 due to reckless hiring and firing of workers. We can improve much in this direction.

Then let us look fairly at the army situation. In our recruiting stations we examine about 80,000 applicants in order to secure 20,000 soldiers. This means that 60,000 are physically unfit! Why dodge the issue? The Life Extension Institute recently gave a thorough medical examination to 2,000 men, averaging thirty years of age, in banks and commercial houses. Only sixty-three were absolutely sound. The draft has revealed less than one out of four men as really fit for service. General Wood has said that only 52 per cent. of our entire population is "physically prepared." What shall we say of mental and moral preparedness as well? Even in our universities the condition is far from encouraging. At the University of Pennsylvania only 97 out of 1,256 men examined were physically perfect. To be sure, the tests were rather severe, but why not? There is a good deal of misplaced emphasis these days. "Fitness" runs to the deepest fiber of life and character. Who stands ready for death, who has not been ready for life—efficient, healthy, educated, moral life?

Edward T. Devine challenges us with the words: "We must push forward with ever-increasing vigor the very measures which are included in the demand for social and industrial justice." They are not unfamiliar subjects: infant and child protection; a reduction of the death-rate; a longer and more efficient working life, safety from industrial accidents and occupational disease, provision for the economic burdens of sickness by social insurance or otherwise; rigid food inspection; the segregation and humane care of the mentally defective; prison administration on humane and reformatory lines; town planning and abolition of overcrowding, of unsanitary alleys and dark tenements; constant repressive action against commercialized vice; a relentless campaign against alcoholism; and above all, educational reform in the light of our new knowledge as to the conditions of successful agriculture, industry and commerce.

WHAT lessons have we learned from the nations at war? Only the important lesson of military preparedness? Are we big enough to face squarely the fact that possibly some of the war's great battles were lost in the slums of London and Paris and Naples before they were actually fought? Shall any of our future battles be lost in today's slums of Chicago or New York? Those who know these same "slum conditions" know it is almost as impossible to grow there strong, healthy, efficient, moral men as to grow roses in ash-barrels. We have much to learn from our allies.

Let us face squarely these issues of every-day life and not be blinded by hysteria. This is no time to exploit our national defects, but there never was a better time, as President Wilson says, to correct our "unpardonable fault of wastefulness." And this means human as well as material waste. The American people can rise to any occasion. We have battles to fight now—in the realm of the social and economic—and we must win these battles if we are to do our full part in the great European struggle.

These which have been peace problems have now become war problems. They must be solved, if we are to meet fairly the additional burdens of the war.

As Dr. Devine well says: "Incredible numbers of the strongest and best men are killed. Incredible numbers of others are wounded and blinded. The ordinary casualties of industry, which concerned us so much but yesterday, are almost forgotten. The birth-rate decreases. The death-rate increases even in the civil population, and in the neutral countries near the seat of war. Tuberculosis breaks through all the restraints built up so skilfully and develops into an epidemic of such dimensions that the 'white plague' is no longer a figure of speech. Typhus and cholera and scurvy and malaria reappear to ravage the more backward nations, and such novelties as trench-foot and gas-poisoning and nervous shock literally overwhelm the medical services of the most enlightened."

This is a great crisis in our national life. We have become a world power with world influence. Let us face today's problems with our eyes on tomorrow. This war will end—our boys will return. The ranks will be thinned, for some will have made the supreme sacrifice for the sake of democracy and ideals. What will the rest find here when they come? War will have stripped them of all sham and unrealities, and they will return, having lived in the democracy of the trenches. As they come marching home shall we be able to tell them that we have won battles here while they won victory overseas? Will they find that we have done our full duty in conquering the enemies within?

The Whole Armor of God

TEXT—Eph. 6:11. "Put on the whole armor of God."

A MOST necessary part of one's equipment for life is the power of imagination—the ability to see the larger meaning of things. Nearly thirty centuries ago a wise man declared, "Where there is no vision the people perish," and in three thousand years no other maxim has been more fully vindicated. The rise and fall of nations, the ascent and decline of character, are inseparable from the ability and desire to see and follow the light of the greater truth.

Do not discourage a child's desire for tales of imagination. The normal soul, even in a child, knows that life is more wonderful than it appears, and the spirit hungers for the food of larger interpretations. Of course, one must learn how to be a man of vision, and not a mere visionary; to avoid stupid cheerfulness with its vacuous smile, and to find the soul of things, which leads one to an idealism both inspiring and constructive.

It is this power of imagination which has given us the glorious company of poets and prophets, discoverers and inventors, statesmen and scientists. Every pioneer, every leader, and all who successfully follow the gleam must have eyes to see and hearts to understand.

It is this clear vision in St. Paul which invariably arrests our attention. It is significant that his Lord brought blindness upon him and then gave him sight again. Not the old sight but a new vision, and all of St. Paul's interpretations of life are compelling with the force of simple truth and practical wisdom.

For example, there seems to be something of the appeal of this very hour in his trumpet-call, "Put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. Wherefore take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand."

HERE is a definite view of man winning his manhood by knowing, facing and defeating the powers of darkness which tempt or attack him. All the while man's cause is God's cause, and God has provided armor for defense and attack with which his child may conquer the darkness and make the light to shine. First of all, he is girt about with truth; before he begins to fight he must have a clear vision of the meaning of the struggle. Then he puts on the breastplate of righteousness; he is to fight in the light of truth for what is right and just. His feet are "shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace," because he fights for peace against those whose feet are shod with the preparation of the gospel of war. "Above all taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked," so that ye shall be neither discouraged by their threats nor deceived by their false promises. "And take the helmet of salvation," for as the helmet protects the head and the vital powers residing in the brain of man, so shall the saving knowledge that you are God's child, God's soldier, protect you in the hour of trial. All this armor is defensive. St. Paul adds to the equipment one weapon of offense, "the sword of the spirit, which is the Word of God."

How the Word of God has echoed in this world since God's first call to honest men over four years ago to "come to the help of the Lord against the mighty"! All too slowly did the armies of light assemble. A lack of vision; inability to grasp quickly the meaning of the attack; a refusal to believe that any rulers could be so base and any people so servile or depraved as to be guilty of the deliberate preparation, the wanton attack, the cruelty and villainy charged against the Germans, all contributed to the hesitation of honest men.

GRADUALLY civilization realized that the impossible, the unbelievable thing had happened, and that if freedom, justice and humanity were to survive, all true men must hasten to the defense with all the power which a God of righteousness had given. No one can doubt that civilization's mightiest weapon has been the sword of the Spirit—souls aflame with indignation against cruelty, aflame with pity for the broken and crushed, aflame with determination to withstand and conquer the enemy of God and man. The Word of God called to the conscience of the world, and the answering soul of mankind, like a sword heated and tempered, is being prepared for the final advance and the peace of triumphant right.

Although St. Paul's description vividly recalls present conditions, we may wisely view from a practical angle the equipment God has given us with which we must face and conquer all enemies. Here we are—body, mind and spirit—to use the familiar division of our powers. How shall all these forces—physical, mental, spiritual—be utilized as divinely-given armor, defensive and offensive, in the mighty contest to which God calls us?

At the moment we appear to be thinking only in terms physical or material. We seem to be putting our trust in men, money, airplanes, guns and ships. Such a criticism would be absurdly superficial. We are commanded to love God with all our mind, and the conspicuous figure in political life who declared a year or so ago that in a time of danger a million men would spring to arms overnight, prepared to meet and defeat the enemy, is now compelled by the logic of events to confess to absence of faith or absence of mind.

WHAT an arsenal is the mind of man! When used to protect and advance justice its armor and weapons are finally invincible. We qualify with the word "finally," because man often requires much time, too much, to "make up his mind," to concentrate the fire of his mental artillery upon the enemy.

The forces of mind are usually divided into thought, affection and will. Thought is, of course, the reasoning faculty, treasuring all we have learned by experience, proceeding logically from cause to effect, rightly estimating the strength of friend and foe, and calculating with exactness the resources required for victory.

Affection, for our purpose, is love of God, of humanity, of the ideals of life and conduct which alone give self-respect and happiness; love of country and of those principles of freedom and justice symbolized in a flag hallowed by the blood of men who loved unto death; love of our dear ones, making us strong in noble rage against those who would shame or enslave them. Love is a mighty weapon in the panoply of God.

After all, it is the will which controls. When the problem has been thought out, when love has made its last appeal, it is the will that commands—to do nothing, or to retreat, or to advance. When thought and love have done their best, the will is not cowardly or weak, but heroic and victorious.

It is a large undertaking to love and serve God with all our mind—with thought and affection and will—but when all this armor is put on, all of it, then man is invincible in the hand of God.

ALREADY you have realized that such use of man's mental powers would be impossible without the stimulation of his spirit. When a man's spirit claims relationship with the Spirit of God all great things are possible in and through that man. He sees the invisible, not the unreal, for the invisible realities are as real and more powerful than all visible realities combined. He sees the invisible host of the immortals; he hears a psalm of life sending out its rich, deep melodies above all earth's discords; he feels the presence of a divine Leader on the battle-ground of life, and he obeys the divine call to go forward and offer his all in defense of truth and justice.

So the inspiration of man's spirit enkindles all the faculties of man's mind—his reason, his love, his will. These in turn enlist his body, strengthen and train it, then bring the fleets of the sea and the air, the guns of righteous anger, and all the wealth of food and money to furnish the sinews of a just and holy war.

The nations which may properly be called civilized and humane have abundant power to roll back and defeat the mighty but utterly criminal attack made by the Hun. Why have they not gained the victory? Because not yet have they put on the whole armor of God.

We may admit that they are convinced that God calls and leads them, but we cannot admit that they have yet concentrated their minds—the mighty weapons of thought, love and will—upon the most powerful aggregation of sinister forces ever assembled. The occasion demands civilization's best thought, but we have not yet given it.

There is no disposition to engage in carping criticism, futile regrets, or faint optimism for the future. It is a fact that we and our allies have made serious mistakes. France has with intelligence and courage largely corrected her errors and is worthy of the highest praise. England has become aware of almost fatal blunders, and is said to be placing her resources on that side of the channel where they will be most useful, and to be contemplating changes in the high military command more consonant with the necessities of this critical hour. Honest statesmanship and the most intelligent military leadership are essential parts of the armor of God. England possesses such power and we are counting upon her using it.

As for ourselves, our regrets are largely related to our folly of priding ourselves upon our utter unpreparedness. At last we show signs of genuine progress; at last we are putting experts where only experts can succeed.

It would be natural for our allies to be weary with the long struggle, weary of waiting for us to become effective. Yet the great need of the moment is for England, France and America to rise to their highest endeavor. At last on the battle-line we have unity of control; now let us have in each land the maximum of thought, affection and will. When we put on the whole armor of God the time of victory may be safely predicted.

WE have been thinking today of the power of vision which enables us to see the larger meaning of life; and we have considered the vast equipment for victory which God has placed in our hands. Let me give you an example of the spirit which is working in millions of our men, a spirit worthy of the finest leadership. Not many months ago it was my privilege to officiate at the last earthly tribute of grateful respect for a noble soul just promoted to the larger life.

He was a physician, and although not physically strong he heard the call to serve in France. If his torch should burn but a little longer it should burn brightest at the last. An acknowledged expert, he was promptly accepted and hastened to France. After some months of unremitting labor he was resting at a hotel in Paris when he heard the alarm announcing an air-raid. Going to the window he was amazed to observe an airplane falling rapidly until it crashed to earth in the vicinity of the hotel. A French plane in the squadron of defense had sustained an accident. Inured to tragedy as he was, he yet felt unable to move until the insistent summons of the telephone sought his skill for the broken and unconscious airmen who had been brought into the courtyard of the hotel. He hastened down, knelt among them there, and worked as he had never worked before. The courtyard was filled with silent sympathy; in all the balconies above were many who prayed and hoped. Finally, the work was done. "They have a chance," whispered the exhausted physician, and then he looked up in amazement at the great silent multitude, to whom he gave a smile of encouragement. When he stood upon his feet a white-haired man stepped forward saying, "Monsieur, I thank you for France!" It was the President of the Republic.

But the brightly burning torch was spent. He returned to his home in this city. Not long ago he received a photograph from France; it was that of the two airmen, back in their plane, flying for France and for God. Now, fittingly, comes his promotion!

That is the spirit of America, of France, of England. With adequate leadership, equipped with the whole armor of God, the victory will be glorious, and it will not be long delayed. The Beloved Captain waits; let thought and love and will burn now at their brightest!

Dear Little Lad

O LITTLE lad, with your sunburned face
And your eyes of dancing blue,
Just yesterday I held you tight
And heard your prayer at candle-light,
Dear little laughing heart o' you.

Dear little lad, with your book and slate,
On your way to village school,
Just yesterday I saw you go
Across the field where daisies grow,
Dear little happy heart o' you.

Brave little lad, in your uniform
With your kit-bag on your back,
Just yesterday you smiled good-by,
And marched away without a sigh,
Dear little loyal heart o' you.

Dear little lad, you will not return,
So your captain writes to me;
Just yesterday he said you fell
Asleep at twilight's vesper bell,
Dear little peaceful heart o' you.

In Extremis

SUNDAY, August 25. I Peter 1:5. "A salvation ready to be revealed in a season of extremity." This is Dr. Hort's translation of the passage which is given to the Authorized Version as "ready to be revealed in the last time." The new light is full of practical and heartening significance. The great promise is withdrawn from far-away issues: it is linked to our own immediate crisis, and it unfolds a holy power which can subdue the most exacting circumstances. It proclaims that while there are forces quite adequate for ordinary needs, there are powerful reserves in waiting which will be called out whenever necessity becomes a fierce and oppressive antagonism. The salvation is "ready." Its forces are not spent in the sunny season, when the demand is only apparently mild and commonplace. They are more than enough for the seasons of extremity, and they are waiting to be revealed. "He leadech me beside the still waters." "The Lord sitteth as King at the flood!"

This storm-covering word should surely give us a large conception of the saving powers of grace. Our thinking is not daring enough. It lags far behind the great venturesome promise of God's word. Our faith moves comfortably in the green pastures: it does not buoyantly face the barren wilderness. We depend upon our spiritual resources for a Sabbath day's journey: we don't set out for the ends of the earth. We believe that Lazarus can be restored when he is sick; but our faith falters when he has been dead four days. And so our conception of God's saving power lingers among the possibles: it does not comprehend the impossibles. Reformation is within the scope of our vision, but not a tremendous revolution. We grow timid at the seasons of extremity. And so we need an enlargement of our thought so as to survey God's wonderful power in the dire necessity. "As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my thoughts higher than your thoughts!"

And therefore this all-inclusive promise should inspire us with victorious confidence. We are to approach our seasons of extremity in sane assurance. For in the heavy seasons our assurance in the saving power of God is a vital secret of our strength. "The Lord is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid?" That is the vital sequence: a great thought of God, and then the destruction of all paralyzing fear. Fear breeds in the narrow mind, it dies in the open vision.

And, finally, this strong and heartening word should set all our going to a song. It is the pinching fear that silences the song. The bird has no song while the hawk is in the sky. It is quiet confidence that breaks into singing. And song, too, is one of the secrets of victory! "The Lord of hosts is with us!" Who cannot sing in that assurance? "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil!" We have Christ's own promise, and that cannot fail.

The Unobserved Kingdom

MONDAY, August 26. Luke 17:21. "Behold the kingdom of God is within you." The late Colonel Wendling wrote a book entitled "Ecce Rex." "Behold the King." Jesus was a King. He said two notable things about the kingdom, as recorded in this chapter of Luke: "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation," and "The kingdom of God is within you." He gave two parables illustrating the invisibility of the kingdom, that of the mustard seed and that of the leaven. The invisibility of the kingdom of God has given rise to a phrase, "the seeming unreality of the spiritual life." Why is religion so apparently unreal to many? Life is full of analogies. The kingdoms of letters, music and art have their foundations in an unseen world. What are the essentials of a kingdom? An authority, a realm, and a law. How is admission gained into the kingdoms of letters and art and music? By submission to that authority, by an abiding interest in that realm, by obedience to that law. The works of these kingdoms are visible though the kingdom itself may elude observation. So the works of the kingdom of God are often visible, but the coming of the kingdom itself is devoid of external symbol. At last, it would seem, thoughtful men in Germany are awaking to their spiritual poverty. A leading German writer has recently said, "The possessor of kultur does not boast of kultur; he has it, and that is enough."

Hugh Stowell Brown a generation ago said a very significant thing: "Talk about the evidences of Christianity! A religion which makes a human life clean and keeps it clean carries with it its own credentials." Conversion, is sometimes spectacular, but oftener it is a silent decision, an unobserved turning to the light. How comes sunrise? Silently. How comes summer? It steals upon us unawares. So the new life in Christ dawns unseen until its splendor of radiance shines out like a new day. It is a new day, the beginning of new days—days that are not all equally cloudless, but days that foretell the perfect day.

Persecution

TUESDAY, August 27. John 16:2. "They shall put you out of the synagogues: yea, the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service." Verily it is not a pleasant prospect which these words open up to the disciples of Christ. For their testimony they shall reap persecution, yea, death. As often as they shall raise their voices, the enemies of their Lord will turn against them, and whoever shall inflict injury on them will be praised by the world as a hero. The old cry: Away with Christ! Give us Barabbas! will be heard again and again in the coming centuries. David professed: "I believed, therefore have I spoken," but adds immediately: "I was much afflicted." From many of his Psalms we can gather the character of his afflictions: he pictures the insolent ridicule with which his testimony was received and the unconcealed contempt with which the rabble cried out against him.

The manners of men may have changed somewhat since these words were spoken, but the spirit of Christ's enemies has not changed. These people are still willing to suffer the worst tyranny rather than to submit to the pleasant yoke of the meek and lowly Christ. They will tolerate all manner of sins and vices rather than accept the rule of love which the Gospel proposes to establish among them. With their so-called charity they will cloak all shortcomings of their petted associates, but have no patience whatever with the preachers of the righteousness of Christ. They can be extremely liberal, liberal to a fault, towards all other men, but towards professing Christians who strive honestly to live their faith and to act in all things consistently with their profession of Christ, these same people can show themselves most intolerant. The truth has never had an easy course in the world. But Christ has forewarned, and therewith forearmed us.

The Work of Our Hands

WEDNESDAY, August 28. Ps. 90:17. "Establish thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it." How short seems the longest life to the active laborer! Plans and purposes increase with years. When death knocks at the door, our lives seem so incomplete. But the Heavenly Father can establish the work of a brief life as a foundation for the eternal building.

Life's faithful toil, woven into a character of truthfulness, duty and devotion, will be a memorial of beauty forever established. Individual righteousness makes honest toil immortal. We must begin at the beginning to build rightly. God's kingdom is the basis of all future development. His heaven of love must permeate all human effort. Then we become likest to God, who worketh unceasingly, and to his Son, who doeth the works of the Father.

Christ, the Builder of worlds, worked as a carpenter for many years, till the hour arrived for the greater achievement of the redemption of a race. We should follow his example as a dutiful child, going to the temple for worship, as a faithful toiler with roughened hands and burdened shoulders; but we must not forget to go with him all the way to Calvary in our self-sacrificing devotion. Here is the hill of highest service. He was first in toil, first in suffering, and will be first upon the throne of all kingdoms.

"Where I am, there shall my servant be also." We should never seek to go around Calvary, or to climb up some other way. His is the only way to establish your life of service as a part of his great kingdom forever. In him the transient becomes permanent. He will make us to live in the hearts of mankind, not for fame or glory, but for the memory of goodness and the favor of the Highest. In him ephemeral deeds become immortal—monuments that never crumble.

Political Atheism

THURSDAY, August 29. Ps. 10:4. "God is not in all his thoughts." One of the primary defects of some people's religion is that they divide life into various compartments, admitting God to some of them and excluding him from others. There are few people of whom it can be said that God is not in any of their thoughts. There are many of whom it is true that God is not in all their thoughts. God is in all worlds, and in all parts of this world. If we do not obstruct his way with us, he is in every human life and in every phase of human life. He must not be excluded from any aspect of life. To deny God a part and place in statesmanship is political atheism. One curse of the world has been politics that excluded God. The only explanation of much of the trickery and deceit in diplomacy of which nominally Christian men have been guilty, is that they did not admit God into partnership in their political thoughts and actions. They have been religious in the temple and irreligious in the counsel-chamber. Is life thus a thing of water-tight compartments? Can a man divide himself into sections, with no relation to one another, and hope to live?

Paul never made a nobler claim for himself than when he said he had "exercised his citizenship Godwardly." (This is the real sense of Acts 23:1. Rotherham thus interprets it: "I have used my citizenship with all good conscience for God until this day.") The politics that excludes God from partnership in government divests itself of the only salt that can save a state from corruption. They who exclude conscience from the domain of civic affairs rob society of the highest motive to loyalty.

Martyrs to Truth

FRIDAY, August 30. Acts 4:20. "We cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard." These words are from the defense which the earliest preachers of the Gospel made when they were tried for disturbing the public peace. When their enemies could not refute their teaching, they derided them as seditious, haughty and conceited people, who wanted to know more than the very leaders of the church. Charges of quarrelsomeness, of love of strife, and of domineering pride have always been raised against Christians when they were doing nothing but testifying to the truth of the Bible. It is, indeed, possible that there may arise in the visible societies of Christians pharisaical tyrants who love to lord it over their fellow believers, or hypocrites whose preaching is rendered worthless by their practice; but such people are Christians merely in name. If ambition and thirst for glory had been the motives prompting the earliest confessors to offer their testimony publicly in behalf of Christ, they would soon have been cured of that. For what did they gain by their testimony in a worldly way? Were they treated as honest and brave men? Were they rewarded as valuable teachers of men? Did they achieve great honors? Far from it; they were instead put in the stocks, cast into prison, scourged and stoned, or expelled from the communities into which they had come with every mark of public infamy. Such treatment, it is reasonable to suppose, should have speedily driven pride out of their hearts and taught them the lesson that mere quarrelsomeness, nagging and fault-finding, and wanting to know all things better than everybody else, succeeds as little in the church as elsewhere. If, after such experiences as they continually met with, they had still persisted in fomenting strife, they must have been either great simpletons, or blind bigots. No, it was not from an impulse of ambition to parade their opinions before the public that they persevered in their testimony against baffling odds; it was not from an expectation that sooner or later their pride would receive the desired gratification; but because they could not help speaking; for the Spirit of truth moved them to speak.

Faithful Service

SATURDAY, August 31. Rev. 22:3. "And his servants shall serve him." A teacher once asked the class of which Thomas à Kempis was a member, what passage of Scripture conveys the sweetest description of heaven to you? One answered, "There shall be no more sorrow there." Another said, "There shall be no more death." Another, "They shall see his face." But Thomas, who was the youngest of all, said, "And his servant shall serve him." Is not this the most beautiful thought in our earthly life—the idea of Christian service? And is not our highest ideal for the everlasting life that we shall serve him?

Will not heaven be a world where still greater service may be performed, a larger circle of activity than we have here, wider, grander, richer and fuller? Not merely an existence of soul rest and enjoyment, but where labor is rest, service pleasure, activity a delight?

The Rice Farmers of "Evangeline's Land"

LONGFELLOW, in describing Evangeline's Land in the Sunny South, says:

On the banks of the Teche . . . Beautiful is the land, with its prairies and forests of fruit-trees. Under the feet a garden of flowers, and the bluest of heavens bending above, and resting its dome on the walls of the forest. They who dwell there have named it the Eden of Louisiana.

Great changes have come over the Eden of Louisiana since Evangeline's day. No more are destructive alligators to be found in the wonderful forests of that country; the prairies are no more open, and large herds of cattle no longer roam over them, for now all prairies have been turned into fruitful cotton, sugar-cane, corn, and, wherever possible, into rice-fields. The dreamy Bayou Teche is now ploughed by steamships and large rafts of logs, for the saw-mills float on the bosom of that poetic stream. The forests have been cut over by large lumber companies; hunters have destroyed the alligators and other game, and the Louisiana of early days exists only in our dreams and in the poetry of Longfellow.

Many Americans do not know that the United States is coming to the front as a rice-growing country. India was always considered the greatest rice country in the world. India is the home of rice, for the very word rice is derived from the Tamil word "arisi." In India, or Japan, or China, it takes one hundred people to grow one acre of rice, because every plant is generally grown in nurseries, and is transplanted into the fields by hand; while in Evangeline's Land great tractors prepare the fields for the grain which is sown by great drills, and is reaped by powerful machines, and the threshing is done right out on the fields, so that a rice farmer in America can easily cultivate 100 acres or more without any help from others.

The races in Louisiana who most retain the charm of the past are the 'Cadians, as they are called, or the Acadians of Evangeline's race, and the Creoles, who are the descendants of the old Spanish and French families of Louisiana. But economic pressure is changing even these conservative races. The labor question is becoming very insistent down there. It is next to impossible to get the servants as of old. The negroes in Louisiana may be divided into two great classes, the Creole or 'Cadian negro and the American negro. The former class speak French fluently and English poorly, and, as a rule, they belong to the Roman Catholic church, while the American negroes belong to the Protestant churches.

"The negro and the mule belong together," so 'tis said down South, and certainly the colored worker, with the help of the mule, grows wonderful corn and cotton crops, and sometimes peanut and sugar-cane crops as well. He does not own the land, but rents it on shares from the planters, who also supply him with the necessary agricultural implements, with seed grains and a comfortable house to live in. I saw cotton fields that were simply wonderful, all the work on which had been done by the negro farmer with his mule, which sometimes belongs to the planter. The Creoles and 'Cadians very often own their little farms, but they live very much like their neighbors.

Missions are doing much for the uplift of all down South. It was my privilege to preach to the different races down there, and everywhere I found a responsive hearing. God is moving on the hearts of the people and our King Emmanuel is making all races safe for theocracy.

The Bayou Teche in the Eden of Louisiana

I DRIFTED down the river in a canoe. It was a pleasant afternoon, and the river was pleasant, and a pleasant little breeze was pushing my slim craft along. My paddle scarcely seemed to brush the water, so easy was the going, and I gave myself up to the lure of dream-making and the fascination of castle-building. The sun was a blaze of splendor in the heart of the blue sky, and the trees along the green banks were rustling and gay. And it seemed as if a band of fairy folk were skipping along behind me on the water, and were smoothing the ripples out of the stream as I passed.

And then—then, all at once, a cloud scudded over the sun, and the little breeze turned into a mocking wind. And I woke abruptly from my dream-making and my castle-building to find that my drifting had taken me far—oh, very far—from home.

I had drifted. And the drifting had been most enjoyable. I had drifted, half unconsciously, through the whole of the afternoon. And then I had realized that the time for drifting was over—that it was time to win my way back.

I swung the canoe around. The wind caught at the bow as I swung it—caught with fingers that were surprisingly strong. I swung the canoe about and started to paddle toward home.

Have you ever tried to paddle a canoe in the face of a gathering storm? It is rather hard work. My arms ached and I found myself panting before I had gone very far on that journey home. The wind kept punishing me—punishing me, perhaps, because I had drifted so far and so heedlessly—and the sun stayed under its cloud shelter. And I, gazing up at the sky apprehensively, knew that a storm was coming soon.

The storm caught me when I was still far from my starting-place. Great rain drops thudded down on the water all about me, and the gayly rustling leaves on the green trees along the river banks were whipped about furiously until the silver backs were turned toward the bleak sky. And I paddled hard—harder than I had ever paddled—and yet seemed to make no progress!

The Danger of Drifting

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

It seemed a long time before I reached home, and pulled the canoe up onto the shore, and started to run toward the house. I was very wet and very weary and rather resentful; resentful of the weather and the weariness, and, more than anything else, of the fact that I had allowed myself to drift—and to drift so far.

I KNOW a successful artist—a man in his late thirties—who works very faithfully and diligently. He is unlike many of the artists that I know, for artists are apt to be a bit temperamental, a bit ready for a good time; for the joy of life, for love and light and laughter. I had often wondered at the concentration of this man, who could work while his fellows were playing, and one day, because we are rather good friends, I dared to question him.

"I can't help wondering," I said, "why you are so different from the others. You do more work than they do. You are more solitary than they are. And you're getting to the top of the ladder faster than they are. Why are you so different?"

The artist looked at me very soberly for a few minutes before he answered. And then—

"You never knew me when I was a boy," he said slowly, "or you'd hardly wonder, I think! For I was the wildest young art student in the city. I knew that I had ability, and yet I wasted time steadily and efficiently—and gaily. I never worked unless I absolutely needed the money, and after a while the orders that had at one time been piling up on my desk stopped coming."

"I remember how one of my teachers—a pleasant old man he was—cautioned me about my lack of—shall we call it sense? 'You have great talent, boy,' he said to me, 'and you are throwing it away. You can't play the game that you're playing now, and win!' I remember how I elapped him on the back and laughed at him for an old fuss. And I remember how I went on thoughtlessly."

"I began to drink. I began with a glass of wine first, with a good friend, and that led to other glasses—and other bottles. I began to gamble. The excitement of it appealed to me, and I spent nights playing feverishly. My paints lay neglected, my easel was empty, and there were no orders on my desk. And the worst of it all was that I didn't care!"

"I was drifting. Drifting on a current that was carrying me faster and farther than I realized. I was drifting, and, lost in the fascination of it, I did not realize there was a storm ahead."

The artist paused for a moment and looked across the studio at his newest piece of work. It was a bit of landscape, delicately colored and executed—a work with a quiet, restful charm about it. When he spoke again his voice held a note of wistfulness.

"Oh, the wasted years of youth!" he said soberly; "the wasted years that we can never bring back—the drifting years! If we could only realize that the storm will come—that it always does come!"

"My storm was a certain debt that had to be paid. And I had no money. My friends? The friends that one makes when one is drifting are not the sort that stick to one in a crisis. I was alone with a long, bitter road to travel. I was alone!"

"I had to have a great deal of money—and quickly. At first, the thought of it did not worry me much, for I knew that I was a good artist—that I had always had work when I wanted it. I went out, nonchalantly, to visit certain of the editors who had liked my pictures in the old days. I went with confidence."

"The confidence left me after I had visited three of the editors. It seemed that they had artists working for them that could be depended upon—steady young men who handed in their work on time. Two of the editors admitted that my work was the best in the market, but that they didn't dare order from me, because I couldn't be trusted with an important commission. One of them went so far as to tell me drinking and gambling weren't exactly letters of recommendation."

"I won't tell you how I worked to 'come back.' But I will tell you that it's never so easy to come back as it is to go down. I found that I had three things to fight against—my inability to concentrate, the distrust of others, and my own weakness, that kept pulling me in the wrong direction. I fought, and it wasn't always a winning fight! There were days and weeks and months when I went back to drifting, and after each lapse the return was more difficult. It took me years to arrive where I am today, years that might well have been spent in forging farther ahead than I ever will go—now!"

OH, there is a very grave danger in drifting! And it's a danger that we all encounter. When some little lazy impulse strikes you, and you yield to it, you are allowing yourself to drift—in the same way, though not to the same extent, that the artist drifted. When some little sordid ambition pushes a worthwhile ideal aside, you are drifting; when you do some tiny thing that your conscience doesn't quite approve, you are drifting. And every time you allow yourself to drift, you are weakening your character and putting another twist in the dusty road that leads back.

Don't allow yourself to drift, even though it is very pleasant to drift! For, as the artist said, there is always a storm coming. And when the storm comes it may suddenly show you that you have been wasting years instead of hours. I was able, despite weariness and dampness, to paddle up the river and reach home. The artist, through sheer endurance and strength of will, was able to win back to the starting place. But some people are never able to get back—their strength, wasted in drifting, gives out. And when the storm comes they are blown far down the stream and lost.

YOU can be a "foreign missionary at home." This is the self-named title of a woman in Lebanon, Tenn., who has had the joy of sending things which are useful to a missionary in his work. In this way she enables him to do work which otherwise would not be accomplished, and adds greater effectiveness to the work already in hand. Multitudes are entering into the work in the home land which will place them in the same class—"foreign missionary at home." In this world-war many who cannot go are having a real part in the conflict by doing a full and essential part at home.

The Surplus Material Department of the World's Sunday School Association has become well known both at home and abroad. More than 27,000 in the home land are sending their "surplus" to mission stations of their own church, or to some interdenominational work.

A pastor of a small church in Illinois can show how the plan operates. He writes: "We have ten Bible picture rolls and a large number of post-cards which we desire to send to the missionaries." He should not have had any of those large Bible picture rolls on hand except the one in use for the current quarter. At the end of each three months the picture roll should be sent to some missionary of his own church whose name had been obtained for this purpose. The cost to mail one roll is about 18 cents. These picture rolls are too valuable to the missionary to be kept in dust storage at home. Now, this particular pastor was given the names of three missionaries in his own church. They were located in Peru, China and Japan. Each of these missionaries would have been glad to have the entire ten rolls, but three names were sent that the local missionary horizon might be broadened. In time that pastor will receive letters of fact and appreciation similar to this one from Peru: "Our pastors put them to use in two ways: in Bible expositions and in distributing separate pictures among the families interested in the Gospel. Up in the mountains you will know an evangelical home as soon as you enter it, for almost invariably you will find upon the walls one or more of these large Bible lesson picture rolls."

EACH year a special drive is made in the early fall by which unknown thousands of packages are forwarded to the missionaries for distribution at the Christmas season. A Presbyterian missionary in Korea asks for more as he says "Thank you" and adds "Some one has said that 'Gratitude is a lively sense of favors yet to come.' If so we want to be very grateful, for we shall need your help in the next year."

more than ever before, for we have now started to work our Sunday school problem in a thorough manner for the first time. Our people are so poor, though, and there is so little in the way of literature or pictures that they can afford to buy. Every bit that you have sent has been used to the limit and some of it several times over. We want anything in the shape of a picture—preferably those large wall charts—for these schools. We hope to have forty running before summer."

Often a missionary states some article that he just must have to make his work more effective. A baby organ is frequently named.

A FEW days ago a missionary from Siam called at the office of the World's Sunday School Association and said that her baby organ had been absolutely worn out and she did not know where she could find a new one; was there one in the Surplus Material file? She was immediately rejoiced with a "Yes."

Full information and an introduction to a missionary of your church can be had for the asking. Rev. Samuel D. Price, D.D., Superintendent of the Surplus Material Department of the World's Sunday School Association, New York City, will gladly furnish details. Name your denomination in full.

Rheims the Soul of France

ONE of the Roman military roads of the first century ran northward from Lyons to Rheims and Soissons, while in the second century Rheims had become a flourishing town, a center of merchandising and of power. Some time in the fourth century Christian missionaries evangelizing the Gaul which Caesar had taken for Rome made Rheims the center of their teaching and soon a bishopric arose, and churches were built, before whose altars converts knelt in adoration of the Christ.

At Chalons the Visi-Goths and the Gallo-Romans defeated the hordes of Attila, the original Hun. At Soissons, in 486, Clovis, king of the Franks, defeated the Gallo-Romans but was himself conquered by the faith of Christ, and baptized by St. Remigius at Rheims in 496. Tradition tells of a sacred phial of oil brought by a dove from heaven for the baptism of Clovis, founder of the French nation of today.

For generations kings of France were crowned in the great Gothic cathedral at Rheims, that cathedral whose destruction under German guns has brought the condemnation of the world upon the modern Hun. The cathedral was built in the thirteenth century on the site of the basilica where Clovis was baptized. In 1481 a fire destroyed the roof and the spires. The roof was restored, the spires were never re-erected. The towers without the spires are 267 feet high, the spires formerly increased the height to 394 feet. The church inside and out was decorated with wonderful statuary, stained glass windows and tapestries. Gobelin, founder of the art of tapestry weaving, was a native of Rheims. At Rheims in 1429 Charles VII was consecrated king of France, while Joan of Arc upheld the royal colors, and though Joan was the "Maid of Orleans" she became the patron saint of Rheims, and her statue was placed in the square before the cathedral. Rheims also boasts another beautiful church, the Abbey of St. Remy, and two fine Protestant churches.

The casket containing the bones of St. Remy, which had lain for centuries in the church of St. Remy in Rheims, was saved from the burning church by French officers, who penetrated to the crypt in spite of the fire and the continued bombardment by the German guns. Lifting the heavy and elaborately gilded casket on their shoulders they carried it out of the church and placed it on a passing military wagon which carried it to Chalons. On August 5 the bones of the missionary who converted Clovis were resting under the care of the Bishop at Chalons, and the church named for him was a blackened ruin.

Always in the area of war Rheims has been frequently taken and retaken. In 1420 it was taken by the English, in 1814 by the forces allied against Napoleon, in 1870 and 1871 it was held for some time by the Germans, while the territory about it was all devastated by their requisitions. In 1914, for a few days before their defeat at the Marne and their retreat to the Aisne, the Germans again held Rheims, and though driven beyond it they still hold some of the circle of forts, which, erected in 1870, made of the busy market city an entrenched camp.

Although the French are through with kings, their hearts still are entwined with the memories of Rheims, and the desperation of their defense in this later battle with their present enemy may well be due as much to the threat against the idol of their hearts as to their hatred of the Hun and their determination to break once and for all the power which since the days of Caesar has always threatened from beyond the Rhine.

John Barleycorn Announces His Exit

I AM the scion of a great family; my ancestry antedates the time of Noah. Good times and bad times do not affect my operation; the last jitney may go to pay me homage, even though the babes cry for bread. Many have been called great, but I am the greatest; my dominion embraces the whole universe. Every nation is made to taste my glory. I cater to the old and the young, the male and the female, I pay them both equal court; the rich and the poor alike tango to my cymbals, the great and the small likewise give ear to my music.

I am a fun-loving, rollicking, smashing-hearted demon, the tarantula of all vices to which man is heir. My methods are most ingenious. I cajole my victim into believing I can steady his nerves, put him to sleep, wake him up, renew youth, stave off old age, increase his joy, dispel his sorrow. I can send the blood coursing through his veins like an electric flash. I burn up, use up and destroy the cells that go to make up the wonderful organization of man. I dethrone reason and convert the gentlest nature into one of ferocity. The most sanguine and optimistic mind I turn into suspicion and jealousy; no brain is able to cope with my onslaught.

I am king of the home-breakers. I point with pride to the thousands and thousands of children I have made homeless, to the vast numbers of mothers I have reduced to rags and tears.

The common boast among men is, "I can stop if I will," but what will can withstand my seductiveness? His will against my power is like a bubble upon the ocean; it rises to the surface, bobs around a few times, and is gone.

Without me, jails, penitentiaries, police courts, detention homes, probation officers, nay, even the electric chair and the hangman's noose would pass into oblivion.

If all the homes I have wrecked, the widows and orphans I have made, the hearts I have broken, the graves I have filled, could be listed and placed in line, they would belt the globe many, many times.

But my long reign is now on the wane. Soon, very soon, the horizon will close down upon me.

In my horoscope I see frail woman approach—woman, the first in transgression, the first in redemption, the last at the cross, the first at the sepulcher, and to her was given first the glad tidings of a risen Saviour.

I see them come in great numbers, men and women, from every land, of every hue and color, head erect, chest thrown out, and with a look of determination in every feature. Such a vast concourse I have never witnessed; some in carriages, some in wagons, others in machines, on horseback, afoot—the whole earth seems to be rocking to and fro in the great commotion. Bold and brave I have been, now I shake with fear and trembling. Pandemonium surely has set in. To add to the confusion, they unfurl great banners bearing startling inscriptions: "Down with Liquor," "Safeguard Our Homes," "Our Children First in Mind," "Save Posterity," "We Love Our Boys." Bringing up the rear is a large white banner, and engraved in gold letters are these words, "The Battle Is Over, the Victory Won."

So, amid the flourish of trumpets, the clash of cymbals and the rolling of drums I make ready for my final exit—"unwept, unhonored and unsung."

Some Seasonable Salads

WHAT may be called the mighty middle class of American housewives has learned much of the uses of salads within a half-century. Time was—and within the memory of middle-aged readers—when they were rated as luxurious features of dinner-parties, luncheons, and evening receptions of "fashionable" folk. They seldom figured in family meals. Their hygienic values and nourishing qualities were scarcely considered by the mother who "thought a salad would be refreshing on a hot day," or the young wife, who, in forecasting the menu for her first dinner-party, knew enough of modern methods to comprehend that a "heavy" salad of chicken or lobster was not "the thing" as an entrée, although altogether conventional for suppers, church fairs and summer picnics.

We are wiser in our generation as to the propriety of utilizing the kindly fruits of the earth in their season. A really excellent salad is one of the most wholesome and toothsome dishes we can set forth for a noon-day luncheon or a hearty supper on sultry evenings. The meatless day may become an opportunity, the appetite may be gratified and the blood cooled in any one of a dozen inexpensive ways through the concocting of the main dish of the meal by the judicious use of succulent vegetables, fresh eggs and a dressing in which oil, vinegar, salt and pepper are justly blended.

This last condition is so indispensable to the well-being of our salad that we will treat of it as the first step in the process.

French Salad Dressing

This is apparently so simple that one marvels at the ingenious perversions of it that often offend the taste of eaters who know what it should be. It is called for in so many combinations of fruits and vegetables that it is worth while to exercise discretion and skill in putting the ingredients together. They are few and simple, as will be seen.

Chill the bowl in which the dressing is to be mixed by setting it upon the ice in the refrigerator, along with the bottles of vinegar and oil, for an hour before you make the salad. Then wipe the inside of the bowl dry, and rub it quickly with a clove of garlic or a cut young onion. Measure into the bowl six tablespoonfuls of the very best salad oil you can buy, three of vinegar, a saltspoonful of white pepper and two of salt. If the vinegar be very sharp, add half as much sugar as you have pepper. Put the vinegar, salt and pepper first into the bowl and add the oil gradually, beating and stirring until all the ingredients are a smooth emulsion. Set upon the ice until you are ready to serve the salad. You may pour the dressing over it before the dish goes to table, or have it passed in a glass pitcher that each person may dress his portion to suit himself.

Mayonnaise Salad Dressing

Let me remark in an aside intended for fellow sufferers, that I am often reminded, in eating salad anointed with so-called mayonnaise, of Madame Roland's apostrophe to the statue of the Goddess of Liberty on her way to the guillotine:

"O Liberty! how many crimes are done in thy name!"

Into a chilled deep soup plate drop the yolk of a chilled egg, drained free of every particle of white; squeeze upon it a tablespoonful of lemon-juice, and stir it in well with a silver fork, adding gradually, a few drops at a time, the salad oil, stirring long and steadily with a silver four-pronged fork. As the dressing thickens, drop the oil rather more freely until you have used a scant half-pint. Lastly, beat in a teaspoonful of lemon-juice, a dash of paprika, and a half-saltspoonful of salt, with (if you like the mordant seasoning) a saltspoonful of mustard. One of the best compounds of salad dressings I know adds a saltspoonful of sugar, which lends what may be described as "suavity" to the mixture. I like it, but others may not.

An acid mayonnaise is a gastronomic solecism.

There are innumerable varieties of "dressings" for as many kinds of salads. The two I have cited are most generally in use by our best cooks.

Lettuce and Egg Salad

Line a chilled salad bowl with crisp cold lettuce leaves, handling them as little as possible. The warmth of the hand acts unfavorably upon the delicate leaves. Bear this in mind in preparing all green stuffs for salad. Cool, clear fingers are necessary in the work. And the tips of the fingers should be used in breaking the lettuce apart. Never cut it before or after it is served. The knife bruises it and injures the flavor. The leaves lining the dish should not be too large to be managed with the fork in eating.

Have ready at hand enough slices of hard-boiled eggs to cover the leaves and be heaped in the middle. Boil them long enough beforehand to allow them to be perfectly cold before they are sliced, then set upon ice until you are ready to dish the salad. When all are in place, pour French dressing over the salad and serve at once.

Or you may have as many small china plates as there are prospective eaters, and the plates (chilled) lined with the leaves, lay in the sliced eggs and send around the dressing with the plates, to be used as individual taste may dictate.

Heated crackers and cream-cheese are a pleasing accompaniment to all salads.

Lettuce and Tomato Salad is made as in the preceding recipe, substituting tomatoes, pared and sliced (always chilled), for the eggs. Pour the dressing over them when all are laid upon the crisp lettuce.

Cauliflower Salad

You should select a young cauliflower for this dish. Cut into clusters and boil tender. Drain, and when the clusters are perfectly cold, lay in the ice-box until you are ready to dish. Line your salad-bowl with small leaves of crisp "heart lettuce"; arrange the cauliflower upon them and pour a mayonnaise dressing over all.

Sandwiches, made of graham bread and grated cheese, go well with this delicious salad and satisfy the appetite upon meatless days.

Beet Salad

Choose young, tender beets: boil and scrape off the skins, drain, and when they are cold, lay in cracked ice to get chilled through. Cut the beets into neat cubes of uniform size, and, as you do this, let them fall into a deep plate or bowl of French dressing. Turn them over and toss, so coat them well with the dressing. This done, set them on ice for an hour. Then line your chilled salad bowl with crisp lettuce leaves. Drain off the surplus dressing into a cup. Put a spoonful of beet cubes upon each leaf, and just before sending to table pour the reserved dressing over all.

This is a decided convenience—sometimes a blessing—to the housewife who superintends what a witty writer makes colored "Viney" call the "conversation of her own foods." (A thing which, by the way, Viney rarely does!) Our frugal housemother saved from dinner on one day a saucerful of boiled green peas, and half as many young carrots cut into inch lengths, while warm, and "conserves" them by covering and setting away in the refrigerator. On the morrow she has a half-cupful of string beans and the same quantity of beets, also diced. A few stalks of celery were reserved from last night's dinner or supper. These she boils tender and cuts into short lengths. When cold and drained, they go with the other left-overs into the ice-box. Tonight, or for luncheon tomorrow, she will line a chilled salad bowl with lettuce, or mayhap with romaine, mix the cold vegetables carefully lest she may break them; pile upon the leaves, and pour a good French dressing over it. A mayonnaise makes it richer, but contributes nothing to the flavor.

If you have cold boiled corn among your left-overs, you may omit the celery—summer celery being inferior to that which is raised for winter use. If this be done, season with celery salt.

B. and B. Salad

For this piquant and pretty dish you want a cupful of tender string beans trimmed, cut into inch lengths, boiled, and very cold. Likewise the same quantity of white navy, or kidney, or white Lima beans, cooked and cold. So much for the first "B." For the second you want a cupful of bright red beets cooked and cold and then cut into small cubes.

It is well to provide these by cooking the beets and beans the day before you make the salad. In the center of a chilled salad bowl heap the beet-dice, next to them arrange a ring of the white, and on the outside of this a circle of the green beans. On the outside of all, have a garnish of crisp heart-lettuce leaves. Just before serving, drench with French dressing. Mayonnaise would injure the "color scheme."

If you use dried kidney beans because you cannot get the fresh, soak overnight before cooking them, and let them, too, get stone cold. A lukewarm salad is an outrage to the educated stomach.

This is a comely luncheon dish and very palatable. It shows up well also at a Sunday night supper.

The Blessedness of Giving

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

IT has been said that style is the man. How true at least that really great men have certain characteristic lines of thought and speech! As soon as you hear the expression, "the strenuous life," you think of ex-President Roosevelt and his myriad activities, while the phrase, "the simple life," instantly recalls Pastor Wagner of France and his helpful messages to the world. Just so when you hear our golden text, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." How like Jesus that saying is! The very essence and spirit of the Master breathes through it. We do not know when Jesus said this, or where, or why. It is not quoted in the Gospel memoirs of his life and sayings. But it was treasured up, from some chance conversation perhaps, and reached the ears of the apostle Paul. He recognized it just as we do, and, upon bidding farewell to the elders of Ephesus, he tells them that he made it the key-thought of his intercourse with men.

How Paul gave! His indefatigable outpouring of thought and effort for the evangelizing of the cities of Asia and Greece and Rome; his ceaseless journeys through perils of sea and land, persecution, suffering, sickness; his daily labor for self-support, mending sails or weaving tentcloth, that the Gospel might not be compromised by his necessities—all these and more he gave without measure. Therein he found his blessing—a full, rich life, given freely with no thought of receiving. Yet he found it true that the best receiving comes in giving. What loves, what friendships, what visions and exaltations he had! So he told the Corinthians that "he who soweth sparingly shall reap sparingly," just as Jesus himself taught that "with what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again."

He who gives, lives. He who gives most, lives most. He shares the experience of Paul and Jesus, and comes to understand the great word, "He that loseth his life shall find it." Christ pointed out to his disciples that unselfish giving makes us like our Heavenly Father, the Great Giver of the universe.

Unbelief in This Beatitude

There are people who are professed Christians and yet do not believe that Jesus was right in his philosophy of life at all. They accept the creeds and dogmas of the Church, but are practical unbelievers when it comes to agreeing with Jesus in such matters as this of giving, and acting upon his advice as to the pathway to blessedness. "A beautiful sentiment, but not practicable in life," was the response of one church-member to every one of the beatitudes!

How to be happy? Some say: Happiness is in getting; get money, get pleasure, get houses and lands and food and raiment. Jesus says, Happiness is in giving; give money, give pleasure, give the things needful to the distressed, give your best, even yourself. Do you really and sincerely believe Jesus was right? Not if you are living by the opposite rule rather than His.

The nearest approach to a person who only receives is a professional beggar. Is his the true happy lot? Some such beggars become rich, but do they ever become blessed? Their souls are dwarfed and lean—pauper souls! Yet there are thousands of other pauper souls, as narrow and dried up as a Hindu fakir's—people who are always getting and never giving; planning, toiling, selling to make money, and scheming, dressing, playing, hurrying to get pleasure, and not giving.

Who but pities a miser? Yet there are innumerable cases of the miser hearts. We are miserly with our pleasures; why not share them? We are miserly of our homes; why not open them wide? We are even niggardly with our religion, close-mouthed, not sharing, not giving it out. For Christian giving is more than the giving of money, though one of the chief uses of money is to give it where it will do the most good. Christian giving is giving of more precious things as well; of friendship, and sympathy, and comfort, and love. "And if ye love them that love you, what thank have ye? For even sinners love those that love them." Christian giving extends to lengths the world knows not—it leads to giving like God, to the unappreciative, going forth to serve the ignorant and the hostile, sacrificing to the well-being of those who will never even know our names. As Lowell showed, Christian giving is the giving of one's self, and the sharing of one's possessions.

Not what we give but what we share.
For the gift without the giver is bare.
Who gives himself with his gift feeds three:
Himself, his suffering neighbor, and Me.

Proportion in Giving

The true joy of giving is by no means found in thoughtless and ill-considered liberality. The Romans had a name for lavish and showy benefactions, prodigalitas, a word whose associations are not Christian at all. But from the Jews we have received the principle of thoughtful, reverent and proportionate giving. The tithe or tenth for God was the Jewish law, and it is not the last tenth but the first-fruits, the best. Over and above the tithe were given free-will offerings by those who had been largely blessed or who felt especial gratitude for God's mercies.

Many of our best Christian people have found great blessing in systematically setting aside one-tenth of their income for the Lord's work. Of course, we are not under law but under grace in this matter. But it does seem as though the modern Christian should be at least as generous as the ancient Jew! Tithers have more to give; they enjoy planning the distribution of their gifts, and with growing prosperity they are led out into a large place of helpfulness in the Kingdom. It is astonishing to find oneself with plenty of money in hand to subscribe liberally to all the fine good causes that are active today. Many a man who started as a tither found he could give two-tenths after a while, and some have even given five-tenths to the Lord's enterprises.

Great progress is being made in our churches as our members are finding the secret of regular, proportionate giving for Christian work. Doubtless many who read this lesson belong to churches where better giving is needed. From Men and Missions comes this excellent exposition of I Cor. 16 : 2:

Paul's Financial Plan

Periodic

"Upon the first day of the week,
Worshipful, habitual, prayerful cheerful

Personal

Let each one of you,
Each man, each woman,
each boy, each girl

Provident

Lay by him in store,
Forehanded, deliberate, thoughtful, intelligent

Proportionate

As he may prosper,
Generous, careful, responsible,
faithful

Preventive

That no collections be made when I come."
No deficit, no worry, no loan interest, no retrenchment.

The Spirit of Giving

The widow's mite was a large gift, proportionately; it was all she had, and she was penniless until. She earned more. But the spirit of her giving was as great a cause for Christ's praise. It was reverent and humble. She gave not to be seen of men, but because, despite her affliction, she appreciated the goodness of God. What a contrast, with the Pharisees' ringing gold cast ostentatiously into the temple chests! It is just as important for Christ to approve how we give as what we give in his name.

Bran is Nature's laxative. It is better than drugs.

Starch clogs the system. It should daily be offset by bran.

We are living in a dark time that is lightened by the wonderful display of sacrificial giving. Never were so many people offering generously of their wealth for unselfish purposes, for the prisoner, the wounded, the sick, the persecuted. The vision of need has opened the hearts of men everywhere. We must never let America slip back into the relatively meager giving of the past. The Church must seize the opportunity to raise giving to its highest spiritual plane and keep it there.

And our people are not content to give money. Women who gave their hundreds or their thousands to the Red Cross could not rest content until they were giving their personal service, their time, their talents. Business men subscribed largely to the Y. M. C. A. and then found themselves growing more and more restless till the chance came to give themselves, and to go "over there" to supplement their gifts of material things with the gift of loving ministry. These are Kingdom enterprises in which God is heartily concerned. In just the same way, a new spirit of giving in the Church will enlist not merely our tithes, but our love, our thought, our prayer, our personal services, in the distinctive tasks of religion. Parents and teachers, see to it that the generous spirit of today shall become the natural instinct of tomorrow. Give your classes training in corporate giving. Lead your boys and girls in the earning of wealth to be used unselfishly. Dozens of girls in our prosperous suburbs have been washing dishes, minding babies, cooking and baking and cleaning in order to give every cent they made to the Red Cross. Boys have been gardening, carting, sawing wood and delivering groceries, not to have "spending money" or "camping money," but in order to give to the Boy's Fund or buy Thrift Stamps of the Y. M. C. A.

Never was there such a chance as now to raise up a mighty host of real givers, loving givers, givers of themselves "first of all" to God and their needy brothers. Those who give most are giving most cheerfully; even those who are laying down their lives in France that the world may be free and happy. In appreciation of those who die so nobly, the children of tomorrow should learn to give, give wealth and talent and service, not grudgingly or of necessity, for God loveth a cheerful giver.

In Memoriam

LIEUT. LAURENCE COLT LOVELL died in France on the 29th of June, for his flag and his country. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." Just before he sailed for France last September he stopped in at the Christian Herald office with his father, who is a member of the staff of the magazine, a bright-faced boy with the light of high courage and valiant youth shining out of his eyes. And we wished him godspeed, and joked a bit about the war (though we held no shade of mirth in our hearts!), and told him to come back very soon.

Into our office, presently, began to drift his letters—letters that his father, sitting proudly at his desk, showed and quoted to us. They were brave letters, that told of good times, and thrilling honors, and a splendid part in a world conflict. He was an aviator. Every day he went up into the clouds to do his duty—to answer the call of his country. His letters told of accidents, of miraculous escapes, of a terrible fall from a broken plane. But he smiled in the face of danger.

And then, on the 28th of June, he wrote his last letter. It was a letter to his mother that he wrote, and he told her boyishly of his joy in the twenty letters that he had received that day; of his affection for his comrades, of his loyalty to and respect for his country. And almost his last words were: "The loving mothers are the real soldiers in this war—to the boys it is the Great Adventure. They will cheerfully prove that they are good soldiers by giving their lives when called to do so!"

Laurence Colt Lovell was the only son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank F. Lovell. Early in 1916 he enlisted in the Signal Corps and served for six months on the Mexican border. At the end of that time he was recommended by his superior officers for the Aviation Section of the United States Army. In July, 1917, he commenced his training at the Aviation School at Cornell University, and he sailed for France the following September. It was in France that he completed his training; it was in France that he received his commission as First Lieutenant early in June, and it was in France, on the 29th of that same month, that he met his death by an airplane accident.

His mother has just received a thoughtful and sympathetic letter from one of his comrades, a fellow officer (under date of July 2) who was with him on the day that proved fatal, stating among other things:

"All who knew Larry loved him well. Experiences in these first months in France cannot help but bring about close friendships. Larry's personality, always cheerful and smiling, always enthusiastic about everything, gives us a memory and feeling that leaves us the better for having known him. It is a loss for us—as well as for you—and a greater loss to his country. He was taken off doing his duty and so suddenly he never knew. It was by no fault of his own. Yesterday afternoon, after a very simple, solemn service, he was buried with military honors, alongside of a few other brave boys who have already given everything they had, on a beautiful spot, high upon a hill overlooking the — river "somewhere in France."

He went to battle in the mist-hung sky.
Like some gold-hearted bird with pinions strong;

He went with courage, with a snatch of song.
In all his splendid youth! And God on high Looked down with love to watch him dip and fly.

Then lifted him to where the brave belong.
He went to right a bleeding nation's wrong.
And proved that he was not afraid to die!

So we, who stare across the lonely hours,
Must only think of that great gift he gave;
Must think of other lives that his will save;
And know that, when the tender, healing showers

Have fallen in a stranger-land, the flowers
Will bloom, like prayers, upon a hero's grave!

Prophecy and the Great War

THE Second Annual Bible Conference conducted by the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago at Eagles Mere, Pa., closed Sunday, July 21, with six great meetings. In addition to presiding over the Conference, Dr. Gray, Dean of the Moody Bible Institute, gave a course of instruction at a Ministers' Institute each afternoon, and by special request spoke each evening on prophetic subjects and current events.

At the Ministers' Institute he took up a line of apologetics from the conservative standpoint. The Bible is everything with Dr. Gray, whose authority in his judgment is best established, not only in the minds of the plain people, but all classes, by the old-fashioned historical methods which he considers have not been outgrown and cannot be.

His course with the ministers covered first: the authenticity of the Bible, tracing its history through the printed page, the manuscripts, versions and writings of the Christian fathers to the time of Christ and his apostles, and in the case of the Old Testament, to centuries earlier than that. His strong appeal is to Christ. An Old Testament divine enough for Jesus is divine enough for Dr. Gray, and a New Testament that can be shown to have apostolic origin is sufficiently canonical for his purpose.

Dr. Gray believes in the miracles of the old and New Testaments, and sets a high estimate on their evidential value, in doing which he cites again the example of Jesus Christ. He holds similar views as to the predictive element in Scripture, and regards the present world conditions as one of the most potent answers to the critics who have belittled it hitherto. Prophecy fulfilling before our eyes is considered by him a strong living witness in confirmation of the Bible. It is this which makes Dr. Gray the robust optimist that he is, because there are other prophecies awaiting fulfillment, chief among them the coming of the Lord, which means light and peace and hope and comfort to the world. These lectures of Dr. Gray, or rather "talks," as he preferred to call them, were ably sustained and supplemented by corresponding talks by the Rev. B. B. Sutcliffe of the Extension Department of the Moody Bible Institute, and by Dr. W. H. Griffith Thomas, professor of Old Testament literature in Wycliffe College, Toronto, Canada. The first named demonstrated at the morning hour's service each day, how the Bible might be made an interesting book to the people, and the ministers went home with more of a love for it in their hearts, and more of an enthusiasm to make its teaching and exposition the staple of their ministry.

Dr. Griffith Thomas, on the other hand, dealt with the living ministerial problems of the day, such as: "What is Authoritative in Religion?" "Why the Death of Christ should be Accentuated as the Corner-stone of Christianity;" and "What the Bible Teaches About Hell." These were greatly valued as strengthening to faith, and enabling pastors and evangelists to stand firmly for the truth against the new drive of religious error within the church.

The evening popular addresses on prophecy by Dr. Gray were free from speculation, mystic theorizing and date setting, and were notable throughout for the strong and consistent stand taken as to the righteousness of the present war and the duty of Christians to support the government and the Allies to the last ounce of treasure and blood. In the judgment of the speaker, God's hand is seen in this conflict, and it would verge on religious apostasy to preach pacifism at the present time or encourage slackers. Pacifism, as a purely academic question, is different from pacifism in the actual situation existing today, and Dr. Gray considers Christian teachers who would advocate it, as limited in their range of Bible truth and especially Bible prophecy.

Dr. Gray threw an interesting sidelight on this topic by quoting from the recent Zionist convention in Pittsburgh, Pa. Resolutions bearing on Palestinian policy revealed the Zionists' purpose to be "not alone to re-establish the ancient homeland, but to build up a model commonwealth in which extremes of riches and poverty should be averted and the old time Hebrew morality and justice become the law of the land." In other words, "Laws relative to divorce, parent and child, inheritance, occupancy of land and such will be based on the Mosaic legislation of the Old Testament, which was revealed from Heaven at Mt. Sinai." "There is no doubt," said Dr. Gray, "that ultimately this will come to pass, and the blessing to follow upon Israel will be one of the great factors in bringing the Gentile nations of the earth into the same path of obedience and blessing." "Why Germany Cannot Rule the World" was an address that awakened special interest, as Dr. Gray showed the impossibility of such an event from the predictions of the prophet Daniel concerning the rehabilitation and future power of the Roman Empire. In this address Dr. Gray expressed the thought that the present war pointed to a realignment of the nations of Europe that will ultimately make for the rehabilitation of that Empire. Germany east of the Rhine, he said, was never in that Empire.

For this reason Alsace and Lorraine were certain to go back to France some day. The Slavs in the Austro-Hungarian Empire reported as ripe for revolt and likely to cause that Empire to crumble, is quite in line with what Dr. Gray understands to be the forecast for Europe in prophetic teaching.

Perhaps none of the addresses on prophecy was more immediately helpful than that entitled: "What is Meant by the Second Coming of Christ?" in which the lecturer cleared away the mists from some minds and put a quietus on certain fanciful and foolish vagaries in regard to that event.

The second coming of Christ, in his understanding of Scriptures, is his personal, in the sense of his visible re-appearing, which he substantiated by an abundance of Bible testimony. And this coming, he went on to show, is prior to any millennium on this earth, and, indeed, is a necessity to introduce such a millennium and make it a possibility. But he guarded against wrong impressions and conclusions on that subject by affirming that it did not mean the end of the world, which was a long way off, but the end of the present age, which was an entirely different matter and might be near.

Ice boxes and refrigerators need frequent cleansing—need to be kept always in a sweet, sanitary condition. Gold Dust does this to the very best advantage, because it so thoroughly dissolves the grease. The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

REALIZING the awful conflict now going on on the battle-fields of Europe, and the terrible strain upon our armies and those of our Allies, I am writing to ask if you cannot see your way to send out through the columns of your great paper an appeal for a Nation-Wide Week of Special Prayer to Almighty God to give strength to our men, great wisdom to all of our leaders, and a mighty victory to our armies.

I believe a request from you for all religious papers to take up this appeal, and make definite and immediate arrangements for all the churches of our land to be opened either at noon or in the evening, for definite prayer to the above end, setting a date, would be heeded and our prayers would be heard of God.

I would suggest the Scriptures of Jer. 33:3—"Call unto me and I will answer thee, and shew thee great and mighty things, which thou knowest not"; Jer. 32:17—"Ah Lord God! behold, thou hast made the heaven and the earth by thy great power and stretched-out arm, and there is nothing too hard for thee"; also, John 16:23—"And in that day ye shall ask me nothing. Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you."

I feel that our greatest hope of victory must come through God's answering the prayers of his people.

A Believer in Prayer, after recounting several signal instances of answers to prayer, asks the readers of the Christian Herald to join her in praying that an injury done to her by an unknown person, which has caused a deep sorrow these many years, may be righted, and that she may be freed from this trouble. She also asks prayer for the spiritual welfare of her husband and restored health for a brother.

G. T., Macon, Mo., writes of his pleasure in reading the Prayer League column and of his fine class of boys in the Sunday-school who, he prays, may catch the missionary vision. He is living by faith and has recently founded the Ebenezer Prayer Watch, through which he hopes to bring encouragement and help to many.

Ninety-seven ask prayer for the healing of relatives and friends, including Mrs. T. H. S., that daughter-in-law may recover from typhoid; Miss L. H., that sister may be cured of kidney trouble and that gangrene may be removed from her feet; H. C. H., that sister may be cured of cancer without the use of the knife.

Mrs. M. B. asks to be healed of cancer and completely restored to health (D. V.); Mrs. A. R. M., to be cured of hardening of arteries and for renewed strength; A Friend, to be cured of cough and weakness of body and nerves; Miss M. W., that my cough may be cured and regular breathing established.

Mrs. E. W. P. and six others ask prayers for the restoration of hearing for husband, relative and friends.

Five mothers and three friends ask prayer for the conversion of sons, and in one case son and wife. One mother adds, after asking for the conversion of her son, that he may become a good working Christian. May the Lord grant her wish and make her son an instrument for much good. Another mother prays that her son may be brought back to the fold, and also that he write her of his conversion. May her wish be fulfilled. Miss E. P., that her brother now in training camp may give his heart to God; six wives, for the conversion of husbands; twenty for the conversion of friends, father, children, sister, and relatives.

A Member asks prayer for a deeper work of grace, and also that she may be given power and words to pray in public; also that wisdom may be given her to do a certain church work assigned to her. Miss L. H. asks to be able to put on the whole armor of God and to devote her life to doing good. A Reader, that she may be given wisdom to decide an important business matter; B. J. C., and ten others, that faith may be strengthened; Mrs. H. C. R., that all who are at enmity with her may come back and be friends again; two especially dear ones; L. B., "that I may be able to dispose of my house without any trouble"; Mrs. E. M. J., "that mother may be able to find a buyer for her house so she can come and live with me and not be so lonesome"; Mrs. A. L. G., that God will keep husband safe and free from temptation and bring him home safely a true devout Christian; Mrs. H. C. R., that a loved one in foreign lands may be kept safe and return; E. L. K., that minister may be blessed; Mrs. A. H., that two children may be kept in the straight and narrow path; A Reader and five others, that sons and brothers in the service may be kept pure and clean and if it is God's will may they return home again; Mrs. H., that a son's and daughter's faith may be strengthened; I. J. K., that sister's motherless children may be saved.

Four friends ask for financial assistance, one in a great crisis and another that the money may come to help her to get away to the mountains, as her health is very much impaired.

Seven ask for prayers for the cure of the liquor habit for brother, son, husband, grandson, and a woman. Mrs. S. McC. also asks that her son may be saved from bad company, which so often goes hand in hand with drink. M. F. S. asks that a friend's husband may be cured and cease to abuse his wife.

Revivals are asked for in the following places: Glen Carbon, Ill.; Krupp, Wash.; Stanford, Ky.; Rutledge, Tenn.; in the M. E. Church at Ruffin, N. C.; Lexington, Ohio; B. J. C. asks prayers for a church which has been organized for the uplift of the fallen; Miss E. F. in asking for a revival in her town, adds that she prays especially that twenty-eight of her friends may be saved at the meeting; Mrs. J. H. N., that they may have the Gospel preached to them oftener than once a month, and that her loved ones and neighbors may be saved thereby.

Four ask for the deliverance of sons, husbands and grandson from the tobacco habit.

A Reader asks that the drought in southern Texas may be broken; six, that the desire of their hearts may be granted; three, that trouble may be removed; two, for world-wide peace; Mrs. G. W. M., that the right man may be elected for governor in Texas; A Subscriber, that husband may be successful in business; A Friend, that a young man may secure his rightful property from his guardian; A. G., that a little boy may overcome his temper; J. M. A., "that I may have a home of my own"; Mrs. J. H. S., that son may be cured of temper; Mrs. C. M. C., that she may be remembered in prayer; A Member, for peace in her family, and that the members of it may not be separated; A Believer, that my husband may give up entirely certain bad associates; A Mother who is in bad health would like to see her daughters established in homes of their own before she is taken from them; Mr. and Mrs. I. S. A. ask the prayers of the League that the missionary work they are doing may be wonderfully blessed; Mrs. F. M., that the Holy Spirit may rest upon our soldiers and sailors and that they may return to us if it is God's will; if not, that it may be well with their souls forever.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS of answered prayer have been received from the following:

Mrs. W. S. C., Stanford, Ky.; Mrs. F. M., Mentor, Ohio; Mrs. S. M. McC., Pasadena, Calif.; Mrs. H. C. R., Wellsville, N. Y.; A Reader, Chino, Calif.; Mrs. H. L. S., Crab Orchard, Ky.; A. L. Showing all the Belligerent Countries and the Battle Fronts.

MAP No. 1—Covering Northwestern Europe and showing the Western Front
This map includes the North Sea, the English Channel, England, Holland, Belgium, France, Germany west of Berlin.

Map No. 2—Covering Central Europe from the Baltic to the Black Sea, and showing the Eastern Front

Alice Bradley's Lemon Pie

Made with Bread-crumbs and without Butter

Miss Bradley is principal of Miss Farmer's School of Cookery, Boston.

"A GEM of a pie," is what you will say when you taste this daintiest of pastries. Scores of families already, by unanimous vote, have elected it Best of War-Time Desserts. It's a connoisseur's pie. It fairly melts in the mouth. Let your men-folks try it.

The Unequaled Recipe

- 3 tablespoons oleomargarine
- 1 cup boiling water
- 1/2 cup sugar
- 1 1/2 teaspoons cornstarch
- 2 egg yolks

Break bread crumbs into small pieces. Add

While economical of materials, this pie is also low in price when measured by the energy supplied.

California Sunkist Lemons are juicy, tart, and practically seedless. They are best for all cooking purposes. Also for garnishing because they are waxy, clean and bright.

Young People's Topics for September 1

All for Christ. Our Tongues

Christian Endeavor, B. Y. P. U. and Epworth League Topic. James 3: 1-12

JAMES in his Epistle compiled a conclusive arraignment of the tongue.

No better discussion of the topic can be imagined than the inspired words of the Apostle. Yet the case of the tongue is not as hopeless as the reference would seem to indicate, for though it says: "The tongue can no man tame," before the epistle is ended James is calling the sinner to repentance, and we know that the grace of God acting on the repentant heart can bridle the most rebellious tongue. But even when the grace of God has entered into our hearts, and we feel that his Spirit has marked us accepted as sons of God, we will still need to put a close watch upon our organs of speech that we do not betray the faith we profess or the friendships we claim. The writer happens to know of a case recently in which a whole family was kept from joining the church by a church member, whose loosely held tongue conveyed to the mother of the family the slightly incorrect information that of all the women in town she—the mother—was the only one not present at a certain missionary tea. There are three modes of speech against which we must guard; thoughtless speech, which inflicts an unnecessary wound (this is the manner in which most of us offend); the deliberate repetition of scandal (it seems almost impossible even for the grace of God to erase from some of us the joy of rolling under our tongue and spreading a rumor that stains the life of another); and angry speech, in which the impatience of the moment impels the tongue to the saying of cutting things. In all these manners of speech we may be telling what is true to our best knowledge or belief, yet it is neither wise nor kind. A heart truly serving our risen Lord would hold our tongue to silence. He speaks most wisely who thinks twice before he speaks, and a third thinking is never wasted. We should make it a rule never to discuss the affairs of another with a third person, except when we may be able to discuss them to the advantage of the absent party. We should make it a rule also never to speak slightly of any one's faith, or of any principle which may be dear to another, even though it means nothing to us. Faith has often been shipwrecked by thoughtless ridicule of sacred things. We should make it a rule also to speak well of any who may be mentioned in our presence, or to keep silence if we can think of nothing good to say. Many a reputation has been ruined by suggestions spoken at random by some one who was merely trying to make conversation. And we should make it a rule also to speak words of comfort and encouragement and of friendly counsel when opportunities permit, and to tell what Christ has meant in our own lives whenever we find an ear ready to listen or a heart which needs the Saviour. Consecrated tongues will find a great deal of good to say and do.

Called Higher

MRS. FANNY AVERY WELCHER, wife of Manfred P. Welcher, and a subscriber of the Christian Herald for many years, died July 22 at her home in Hartford, Conn. One of Mrs. Welcher's unobtrusive ways of doing good was to subscribe to the Christian Herald for many persons from Connecticut to Alaska, who would perhaps not otherwise have been readers of this journal. Her father, the late Samuel Putnam Avery, of New York, was a well-known art collector and founder of the Avery Architectural Library at Columbia University. She leaves a husband and four children, besides a host of friends.

Conservation Service

WAR demands alertness, a ready response to leaders, prompt action. Food problems are constantly changing and call for the immediate response of all America. Conservation is democratic, all may share, all may help.

Three times a day every American can say when he sits down to the table, "This is my chance to serve. Directions are given me by the Food Administration that I should follow and follow at once like a good soldier. If I fail, whether selfishly or ignorantly, I desert the colors of the nations fighting for democracy—I stab in the back the men we have sent to France."

Follow directions—emergency orders call for immediate action.

The National Marine League

NOTHING strikes closer to the commercial heart of our nation from the coasts to the interior than the Merchant Marine—one of the main arteries of our industrial life. Mr. Edward N. Hurley, chairman of the United States Shipping Board, says, "The vast merchant fleet we are building must become the greatest instrument of international probity, honesty and square dealing at the close of the war."

Before the war, our merchandise and supplies were shipped under terms and conditions dictated by other nations, in ships flying foreign flags. Our tourists traveled in foreign ships. Foreign ships everywhere, American ships nowhere. The time is at hand to fulfill our maritime destiny. Every red-blooded American should thrill with the inspiring vision of the American flag flying over American ships.

The National Marine League of the United States was established to foster among our people and legislators a knowledge and recognition of the economic importance of this arm of commerce as well as a patriotic pride in its restoration. Maritime and commercial independence and the development of overseas trade are the cornerstones of our after-war prosperity.

The League needs many more members to carry on the great work so splendidly begun. Will you join the League today? A captain, in the early days of the Revolution, to provide against eventualities, nailed his flag to the mast. Will you do your patriotic bit to help us nail the American flag where it belongs, at the masthead of every ship of that great fleet the United States is building?

Remember, when the peace treaty is signed, a new war begins—the war of commerce. Do your part as a patriotic and practical American by joining The National Marine League of the United States. Today.

China's Great Dragon Festival

WE left Hing Lung Chang in a dismal rain at five in the morning. We descended into a lovely valley, at the bottom of which there were some eating places, and I had a fine breakfast of five peaches for two-thirds of a cent and a big bowl of rice for another two-thirds of a cent. My chairmen had the same, except that they took two bowls of rice and passed up the peaches, as too luxurious a diet for men who only make twenty-six cents a day and have a three-hundred-mile walk at the end of eleven days, for which they get nothing.

Soon after breakfast we climbed to a pass at a height of 2,700 feet or so, and then began our descent to the fertile Chengtu plain, where seven hundred farmers live on a square mile of land. As I walked down the steep path, I met scores of burden-bearers toiling upward, and several chairs laden with sleeping Chinese. One of these gentlemen was of elephantine proportions, but none of them had more than two chairmen, though a foreigner usually has four. The wiry fellows that lifted those human hulks of fat up the steep hill sweated and wheezed like engines of steel rather than flesh, but they would not think of asking their loads to walk up the steep places. I have never seen a Chinese walking up a steep hill to rest his carriers. In heat or rain, a foreigner, man or woman, usually walks when the hill is steep and long.

It seems almost inhuman for men to treat other men in the way I have described, but the Chinese gentry, when they get fat, are very poor walkers and worse climbers. Until very recently, only high officials could have chairs with three or four bearers. Sometimes the chairmen ask a foreigner to ride when he sets too sharp a pace, and especially when they have sublet their contract, but they never ask a Chinese to walk.

I mention this, not to make fun of Chinese laziness, for no person who takes the trip I did can think of the Chinese as lazy. Early and late they toil, and when seven hundred farmers live more closely than the same number of Belgian mechanics, toil is a necessity to life. But the elephantine Chinaman being carried by two small chairmen is a fairly good picture of conditions as they are. The common people of China work hard and long and keep cheery in the midst of it all, while the officials ride them to death. I can say nothing too strong in praise of the industry, thrift and good nature of the Chinese of the interior. And though I have met several governors and other officials, and though Chinese officials almost invariably treat foreigners well, I can say too little in denunciation of Chinese officialdom.

AT a turn of the valley we could look out across the great green plain, seemingly almost level and dotted with dark masses of trees. From a distance the whole scene was blue gray in the haze of the early morning. We descended to Chiao Kia Pu through a great field of Indian corn, much higher than my head, and ferried across the river into a market town at its busiest. It was the fifth day of the fifth moon, the day of the Dragon festival.

When Japan is on holiday-making bent, one might think the whole land wealthy. Silks are everywhere to be seen, and beneath fine silk haoris one may see touches of bright-colored silk crêpes of gaiety and charm. Not that the outer robes are bright in color. Black and gray are the prevailing colors for the adults. But with the bright obis and the touches of color at skirt hem and throat, a Japanese crowd is colorful and gay.

A Chinese holiday crowd in Szechuan is well dressed, in that the clothes are neat and clean. But during that holiday, which I spent in three different market towns, in a district that produces lovely silk, I did not see one silk gown, nor one garment that could be described as elegant. The wealth of a Chinese crowd on a holiday is not on their backs, but in their hearts. It is the joy of the laborer taking a well-merited rest.

Old ladies were coming in on wheelbarrows, the only wheeled vehicles in Szechuan. They were smiling in anticipation of the joy they were to feel at seeing a score of half-naked men thresh the waters of the swift river into foam with their paddles, or at hearing the falsetto songs of the theatrical troupe, with its shadowgraph entertainment with simple puppets like Punch and Judy.

TINY children were coming in to join the tightly packed crowds. One would think that their mothers would keep them out of the mass of pleasure-seekers. But a Chinese child is never as happy as when it is in a mob, chewing away at somebody's shoulder or clawing at his ear in order to attract attention to the fact that entertainments are for the young as well as the old. Many of the children wore large bibs, on which there were sewed awful monsters in appliqué work or meek looking geese that covered the whole breast and were padded out from behind, whether by a full stomach or wads of cotton, I could not discover. More likely wads of cotton. Some of the bibs had great pockets, constructed at so great an altitude that it must have been next to impossible for the children to get their hands into them. They must have been put there to catch any crumbs that might fall from the bowl of rice, though even children learn not to drop much food in China. Food here is used to appease hunger and not for mural or facial decorations.

We had a very nice lunch. Mine consisted of a sort of paste made from peas, very much resembling tasteless blanc mange, without sauce or other appetizers added.

During the morning the sun had come out, but the sky was filled with welcome clouds, and the day was cool and delightful. For the next twenty miles the road was a path of beauty and charm. On each side there ran one of the thousands of canals that carry the water of the Himalayas to the remotest corners of the Chengtu plain, and here and there the bamboo water-wheels were singing their raucous but contented song of continued toil. Tall pagodas pierced the blue, and ornate widows' arches crossed the path at frequent intervals.

THE time came for me to dismiss my soldiers and take on some more, so I had to halt for a half hour till they caught up. When they arrived I discovered that there were three instead of two. I protested that I had seen only two, but the third courageous protector of my goods and person explained with a sincere smile that he had come by another way. I gave them my Chinese card, showing that I had been safely delivered to the next bodyguard, and bade them adieu. They had come thirty-seven miles, and I believe that one of the three was a "ringer." If so, those soldiers are nearly four cents richer for their dishonesty. Graft on such a scale ought to be stopped. I don't see how it pays. But the men are soldiers and probably are doing their best to fit themselves for generals.

That night I slept in my second Chinese inn, which maintained the same high standard as the one I had slept in the night before. It had the advantage of a wood floor as well. During the night it rained very hard, and at 4:45 the next morning we set out on the last leg of our journey to the capital. Daylight had not come as yet, and a dismal rain was falling. I say dismal, but that does not describe the rain. It seemed glad to fall.

At our breakfast place the proprietress added to her income by making children's hats that would be hard to beat for gaiety and cheapness.

The straw was not crushed or woven, but left in the proper condition for extracting cider from a big barrel, à la New York or Wisconsin. Small pieces of highly colored paper were pasted to the brim, and little dangles of straw with a puff of cotton on the end hung from the circumference. The crown was made of alternate sections of straw dyed red and blue, and put together in the most peek-a-booeey fashion. I think the style is the forerunner of the skeleton hats that the ladies with lots of real hair wear in America. As I had used up one film pack, I unwrapped another and gave the tin-foil and red paper to the lady hat-maker, so that a style even more resplendent but selling at the old price of one cent each may soon appear in Szechuan. The hats are very fetching when worn by slant-eyed children of four, who look cross-eyed at the cotton puff on the ends of the dangles, and blow them out of the way in a really ludicrous manner. Such a hat is clothing and rattlebox in one.

At most of the eating-places, there is a row of wooden wash-basins, above which there are suspended several small wash-cloths, which are well patronized by the travelers. Hot water for soaking tired feet can also be had. It is thus easily seen that while the customs and costumes of the Szechuan road are not extravagant in their scope, they meet the needs of the situation. The wash-cloths are always clean. How can they help being so when fifty people a day wash them out while using them?

I SOON learned the Chinese method of washing by wringing out my towel in hot water and wiping my face with that rather than splashing precious water around in the way we love to do at home. Between washes, which are frequent in summer, as the hot water is most refreshing, the towel is hung from the top of the chair, where the warm sun keeps it sweet and clean. Simplicity is the keynote of travel in the interior, and woe to the man who demands more.

At a point seven miles from Chengtu there was an improvised barracks situated on a hill from which there was a very fine view of the plain below. Even at this short distance nothing could be seen of the city itself. Chinese cities, if built on a plain, are not conspicuous, and one may get almost to the walls themselves before he sees where the city is to which he is traveling.

The soldiers at this seven-mile place were holding up every chair, and every man had to show a permit to travel. Two chairs came up with women in them. Women do not have to show any permits. One showed her face and the other her feet. The soldier allowed both of them to pass at once, just as I would have done. The face was painted in the best poster effect, and the feet were bound. Both of these women were dressed in silk, and were the only two women I saw thus dressed in the whole trip. They were bound from the capital to the camp of the soldiers.

Five miles from Chengtu, the road widened from one flagstone to two, about three feet apart. With wheelbarrows passing continually one would think that there would have been a law of the road governing traffic on these two raised highways. There was none, or at least there was no observance of any. Wheelbarrow men used both indiscriminately, turning out for one another whenever necessary and getting stuck in the mud in the process. The Chinese are such a practical people that it seems as though they would learn a law of the road under such conditions. But each man starts on the path that seems best at that moment, caring little that he must turn out a hundred times in five miles. Politeness goes to waste there, if it ever does.

By noon we had reached the far-famed city of Chengtu, whose Chamber of Commerce had called it the cleanest city in China. It had rained most of the morning, and the slimy approach was between long lines of very small and very unattractive shops.

Incense burner and humorist monk.

THE people of Chengtu like to call their habitation the roof of the world. The reason is not entirely plain. It is true that one can see the mountains of Tibet from the sleeping-porches of the Chengtu missionaries, but they are a long way off and are very much higher than the eleven-hundred-foot altitude of the great Chengtu plain. If Chengtu is the roof of the world, it is only the woodshed roof or the henhouse roof or the roof of the dog kennel. You can't expect people from really altitudinous places like Tibet or Pike's Peak or the Woolworth Building to admit that Szechuan is the true pinnacle of earthly dwellings. But the people call it that, and if they prefer living on the roof instead of in the parlor one cannot dispute them. For Chengtu is certainly no parlor.

Some years ago there was in Chengtu an official who had studied in Japan. He had the streets kept very clean and there was not a beggar to be seen, for he had them taken off the streets and put to such work as they could do to make themselves self-supporting. That was the heyday of Chengtu's housekeeping. A prominent American traveler, reaching Chengtu at this auspicious time, said that one could eat off the streets.

Marco Polo visited Chengtu, which at that time had paved streets. It is several centuries since that time, and today there is not a ricksha or two-wheeled conveyance in Chengtu. One would think that after centuries of paved streets the people would have introduced some kind of vehicle that would do as well with one puller as a chair does with from two to four bearers.

Chengtu has a very well preserved city wall, and in one very restricted area, where bad English signs proclaim the attempt to be progressive and up-to-date, there are a few electric lights. Its city water-works system consists of four water-wheels such as one finds in Hamath on the Orontes, and it carries water from the river to various water-troughs throughout the city, where the water-carriers can buy water for a cash a bucket and thus save a long carry from the river.

The present-day Szechuanese are a polyglot group, who have come from most of the other provinces. They are certainly not physical giants, and any distinction they have is because they are crafty and progressive. Craft and progressiveness, however, are sometimes at a premium among Occidentals as well as Orientals.

Chengtu is a very important city and is a good city, as Chinese cities go. At least it was when I saw it, and I think that in spite of the difference between its several rulers it has not been entirely burned down since.

IN JAPAN I had the pleasure of interviewing two premiers in one week. But in Chengtu, at any really interesting time, a good journalist ought to be able to interview at least seven governors a week. The man who was acting as civil and military governor while I was there was telegraphing wildly to Peking to be allowed to resign. No wonder! He was having all the dangers of being an official without any of the emoluments. Four other "generals" were collecting the revenues of the province, and Tai Kan was only a figurehead, without any fixed income. A figurehead in China is usually considered as a target for rifle, artillery and bomb. Tai Kan is a Kweichow man, and General Liu, whose camp of Szechuanese soldiers was five miles outside the north gate, had seized two of the city gates, obligingly leaving to the nominal governor the two gates which headed toward Kweichow and home for the unhappy official.

While Tai Kan was seeking leave of absence from a city which was nothing more than a prison, General Liu was giving dinners and receptions to the consular and official bodies in the hope of gaining face. When Chang Hsun put the thirteen-year-old Emperor back on the throne long enough for him to have his picture taken in that seat of honor, Liu was offered the position of governor. But he rightly guessed that the monarchy would not last long, so he declined with all the grace that a man is capable of when he is two thousand miles from the national capital and there isn't a military road in all those two thousand miles.

Chengtu is the only real city in the interior of a province that contains half as many people as the United States. It is the metropolis of West China, the front gate to Tibet.

IN one of our Southern army cantonments, the Sunday evening service at the Y. M. C. A. was just closing with a strong appeal for clean living.

Acting on the suggestion, a boy (for he was only 18½ years old) came to the desk and asked to see the secretary. As the two sat together the young man started by indicating how hard it was for a young man no matter how good a start he had at home to live a clean life in the Army. He said he came from as fine a Christian home in the North as any man could wish for, and the ideals of the home were stamped upon him to a strong degree, but said he, "I can't stand the spirit of that squad and listen to that conversation and keep clean much longer. I'm standing alone, and I must have help soon or I'll fail sure." And he said it with the seriousness and urgency of a drowning man as he grasped the secretary's hand. "The day I left," he said, "my mother took me alone into the kitchen and put both her hands on my shoulders, saying, 'My boy, I hate to see you go; it breaks my heart; I'm not afraid of bullets or rigid military discipline; in fact I'm proud to have a boy give his life for our country, but you know what I fear most. Son, can you come back home, if God permits it so, as clean as you are now; and when you do come back we'll get together in this kitchen as we are now in this same position and you need not tell me if you are clean, I'll see it in your eye. Can you do it my boy, can you do it for your mother?" With the assurance that he would keep clean, she said, as she handed him a neat little Testament, "Take this; it will help to keep you clean; and read a part each day and I'll do my share of praying for you from the old home."

The Soldier Boy's Testament

After the secretary had heard the story he said first, "How about that New Testament? Have you used it any?" The reply was that he attempted to use it according to his promise the first night in the tent, but the remarks were so abusive and the conversation such that he closed the book and never again attempted to read it before any member of the squad or when any one was ever around.

He was assured by the secretary that he must start just where he should have started the first night in camp, if he was to live clean; and the secretary, in turning to him, stated he would be all the help he could to him in his new determination and asked him if he could carry out his promise to his mother. "Can you go back tonight," he asked, after this conversation, "and can you open your New Testament and exert enough manhood to carry out the promise made to your mother more than five weeks ago?"

On mentioning his mother's name to the boy, the latter said, "I'll keep my promise or die."

When he got to the tent every one of his squad was already in, some in the bunks and others undressing, and his heart almost stopped beating as he heard their songs and their profanity. He lit his candle, put it on the edge of his bunk, and started to read Matt. 1. A shoe from across the tent knocked the candle down, which rolled under his bunk. He lit it a second time only to have it put out again. But he lit it again and stuck it out a while longer, till remarks became fewer and fewer and one by one they dropped off to sleep, and he was still on his back by the light of the little candle reading from Matthew. "Before I finished I read seven chapters," he said, "and while it was all quiet I slipped out of bed upon my knees and prayed for every man in that tent."

"Can you repeat the process tonight?" said the secretary. "Sure," was the reply. "If I got through the first night, I can."

For ten successive evenings the young soldier came to the Y. M. C. A. to recount the experiences of the previous evening, and the last night the young man brought this testimony: "I haven't said a single word to any man about clean speech and clean living. I have guarded my own tongue, and each evening read my Testament and prayed for the men, and now four other men are reading their Testaments and they are putting the soft pedal on cussing when we are around."

These five later formed a Bible group, and all but one of the squad was in it. Profanity was henceforth almost unknown in that tent. The day before the regiment was to be transferred, the secretary called on the young victor to inquire how all was going. "Fine," said he. "Can you look your mother in the eye when you go home?" The reply came strong and unmistakable, "I can look anybody in the eye; thanks for your interest in me."

Allied Attacks Force Teutons Back

THE outstanding feature of the western battle-front in France in the week ending August 19 has been the continued retirement of the Germans at various points under the pressure of incessant attacks by the Allies. At no one point has any engagement occurred of major importance. It has been a week of tense struggle on Germany's part to hold the military bases which the advance of the Allies is constantly threatening. Old battlefronts are changing from day to day, and new fronts being formed as the Allies make headway. Territory that was the scene of bitter struggle two and three years ago is now being fought over again.

Prisoners captured by the British north of Albert are quoted as asserting that it is the German intention to withdraw entirely from the old Somme battlefield, as it is too muddy and broken for winter operations. There is a growing impression that General Hans von Boehn, former commander of the Seventh Army in the Crown Prince's forces, has been chosen to direct German operations on the Somme for defensive rather than offensive purposes.

Allied aviators reported great activity in the rear of the enemy positions toward the close of the week. This may indicate either that another "Hindenburg line" is being prepared, or that early evacuation of the present Roye-Lassigny-Noyon line may be looked for. Whatever the purpose, it has not deterred the Germans from putting up a stubborn resistance at every point of contact.

ON August 17 the Allied line paralleled the highway from Chaumes to Roye, crossing it at Dan-court and reaching to the neighborhood of Lassigny. The latter is regarded as the keynote of the arch, which, if it should fall, will imperil Germany's hold on the entire section from Chaumes to Noyon, Ribécourt, immediately to the south, having already been recaptured from the Huns. South of Lassigny the Germans have constructed powerful defenses. Their machine-guns, securely hidden, form a mass a mile deep, and there are strong intrenchments besides. Owing to the roughness of the country and the numerous thickets it is impracticable to use tanks, and artillery has a hard task searching out the machine-gun nests. Yet in the furious local fighting which has marked the steady progress of the Allies, over 1,000 prisoners have been taken and the capture of many machine-guns is claimed by the French War Office. The Allies are now firmly planted on the crest of the high ground or massif of Lassigny, with their guns bombarding the Germans from the rear.

North of the Anere River and along the Roye-Amiens road the British also made substantial gains.

In the Picardy fighting the Canadians, forming the center of the Allied line, by a brilliant attack took the villages of Danery and Parvillers, northwest of Roye, cutting it off from the main roads and rendering it useless to the Germans. The French, under General Humbert, meanwhile pressed strongly forward in the direction of the Lassigny-Noyon line, capturing several villages and taking prisoners.

On August 16, in a drive in the Autrechies section, about ten miles northwest of Soissons, the French forces flung the enemy back to about the depth of a mile on a three-mile front, taking 240 prisoners.

An important capture was the Monolithe farm, in the Thiescourt region, by General Humbert's troops on the night of August 17, when he not only inflicted severe losses on the enemy, but dealt a heavy blow to the entire scheme of German defense in the southern part of the Picardy battle line.

Along the American front on the River Vesle, our marksmen have been busy cleaning out the Hun snipers at a lively rate. At Fismette, a village across the river from Fismes, there has been a good deal of bombing and heavy artillery work by the Huns, and three deliberate attacks with bombs on American Red Cross hospitals.

General Haig's troops, on August 18, forced the Germans back on a four-mile front between Bailleul and Vieux Berquin, in the Lys section, capturing Outtersteene village and penetrating the enemy lines from one to two thousand yards.

There is an impression that the comparative lull which has marked the week may be preparatory to bigger events soon to take place. While the retirements were largely strategical, there are unmistakable indications that lead military observers to believe that the waning morale and the heavy loss of German manpower are the principal causes of the weakness of the enemy line over the whole battle-front. This has been made so clear in these last weeks that military experts who have been watching events closely have declared that "it is doubtful whether Germany can undertake another offensive this year."

During the fighting on the British front, a copy of an order recently issued by General Von Ludendorff was taken from a prisoner. It was dated June 25, and laid special emphasis on the duty of avoiding needless losses in men, and that casualties should be reduced by every possible means. This order applied equally to defensive and offensive fronts. The order ended: "It is therefore essential, for the future conduct of the war, to maintain everywhere our fighting strength and spirit of offensive. These two elements only will insure our eventual success."

Attacking on a fifteen-mile front, on August 19, from near Lassigny to Fontenoy, six miles west of Soissons, the French made important progress and took 2,200 prisoners. North of Lassigny the village of Fresnières was taken and the western outskirts of Lassigny were reached. South of Noyon villages were taken on the west bank of the Oise, while between the Oise and the Aisne an advance of nearly two miles on a nine-mile front from Carlepont to Fontenoy gave the French the heights of Nouvron and the plateau west of Nampoel. From these new positions French artillery was enabled to take in the rear the German forces before Noyon and along the Vesle.

On the same day, British troops in Flanders, took the village of Merville and adjoining positions in an advance along a front of over five miles.

TO meet her urgent need of men both east and west, it is reported that Germany has sought from Austria twenty divisions, and that the Austrian frontier has been closed to permit of their transfer. Changes on the western front in the last ers and guns than the Allies have taken in any other four weeks since the beginning of the war.

WASHINGTON military authorities expect a new Allied drive against the German positions, either in Flanders or between the Oise and Soissons, the slowing up of the advance in Picardy being preparatory to the new offensive. The greatest advantage won by Marshal Foch consists in having wrested the initiative from the enemy. Some officers incline to the view that the organization of the First American Army may be followed by an All-American attack at some point in the line beyond Verdun, where it has been comparatively quiet. Nothing definite is known, however, of General Pershing's plans.

The French, British and American thrusts in Picardy, according to official reports to the Washington government, have extended over a 53-mile front and attained a maximum penetration of 15 miles.

General March, in a statement before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, on August 15, said: "The purpose of America is to furnish enough man power to whip the Germans from now on. The only way that Germany can be whipped is by America going into this thing with her whole strength."

Senator Kirby here asked: "Then America has got to put enough men over there to whip Germany?"

"That is it in a nutshell," was the General's answer. "The authority which is granted the President in this bill gives him the power to call out classes, but does not make it mandatory. It is up to us to win the war, and we can win it. How long it will take will depend exactly upon what we do. If we drag along with this thing, and put a small force over there, we will be playing Germany's game. It is my belief that with an American army of 4,000,000 men in France under one Commander-in-Chief, we can go through the German line wherever we please." General March, on August 19, said that with 4,000,000 men in France we can win the war in 1919.

MANY instances of courageous air fighting occurred during the week. One Allied two-seater shot down two enemy machines, doing battle in the blue, and although the pilot was badly wounded, both occupants came to earth safely, with a damaged machine. There were instances where a squadron of Allied machines, skimming close to the ground, fired point-blank into the enemy troop formations, killing and injuring large numbers, and yet escaped unscathed. At other times, they attacked and disabled lightly constructed German tanks, before the latter had a chance to get into action.

On the Thiescourt plateau, where the French secured a firm hold with a commanding position that overlooked the main roads from Roye to Ribécourt and Noyon, the German losses were found to have been extremely heavy. Some fields were dotted with their dead. Bodies were found in shell holes and nooks where the Huns had vainly sought protection from the withering French fire. Very few survivors were found in that month seem to have made a profound impression on the German mind, in the attitude of both troops and civilians, as to the outlook in the war. German officers, captured within the last few days by the French, are quoted as openly stating that Germany has lost the war. Others, of course, still pin their faith on Hindenburg's skill to redeem the situation. Meanwhile, the enemy losses grow larger daily. In an article by Henri Bidou, a leading French military authority, published in Paris on August 15, it was estimated that Germany's losses from July 18 to August 14 approximated 350,000 dead and wounded, and 70,000 taken prisoners. Only sixteen reserve divisions (192,999 men) now remain of the great reserve with the aid of which the Germans hoped to accomplish a decisive result. These figures closely coincide with the estimates of the Allied commanders, which gave the captures from July 18 to August 14 at 73,000 men and 1,700 guns. This is a greater number both of prison-section. One German wireless operator was rescued from the bottom of a well where he had taken refuge.

In a recent encounter, during a day of intensified fighting, the Fifth Bavarian Division was caught near Lihons by the Allied advance and lost so heavily that it was of little use afterward. The 41st German division was reported as practically annihilated. From one enemy regiment, the 28th infantry, 528 prisoners were taken.

The British, in forest fighting north of the Somme, captured in the woods many Huns and with them a box containing 450 iron crosses, which had been intended for distribution. A British squadron outflanked the German positions near Rosières, capturing a whole trainful of soldiers with between 300 and 400 prisoners. These men were returning from leave to duty at the front. The squadron took, besides, in a small wood, 3 batteries of 77's.

A Moving Picture of the Week in Russia

THE British Government on August 13 issued a declaration formally recognizing the Czechoslovaks as an Allied nation and their armies as an Allied force regularly waging warfare against the Central Powers. This recognition followed similar action by France and Italy. The Austrian Government, on August 17, announced that members of the Czechoslovak army would be regarded and treated as traitors by Austria-Hungary. The perplexities for Germany in the Russian situation were increased on August 16 by the announcement of the arrival of a British force at Baku on the Caspian, the center of the Russian oil district and the objective of Turko-German troops fighting their way westward from Tiflis. Another considerable column of British Indian troops was reported as advancing through Turkestan to support the Cossacks in their resistance to the Bolshevik Red Guards. The port of Baku was held by a mixed force of Armenians and Bolsheviks, the latter having refused to recognize the treaty of Brest-Litovsk. The Don Cossacks under Gens. Alexieff and Denikin were also reported to have driven the Bolsheviks back on the Don and to have made real progress toward a union with the Czechoslovaks on the Volga. Allied forces landed at Archangel were making progress southward, having reached Pabereshkaia, 100 miles south of Archangel, on the railroad to Vologda, meeting Bolshevik resistance. Allied forces have been landed 100 miles southwest of Archangel, to intercept Bolsheviks retiring from Archangel, while another Allied detachment is pushing toward Kotlass, 260 miles south of Archangel on the Dvina river.

Twelve hundred American troops disembarked at Vladivostok, August 14, to join the international force to aid the Czechoslovak Army in its campaign in Siberia. The Americans compose the 27th Regular Infantry Regiment from Manila, and will be followed by another regiment from the Philippines and more troops from the United States. The first Japanese regiment landed at about the same time as the American forces. The excellent spirit of the Americans and their enthusiastic cheering amazed Vladivostok, the other Allied forces being less demonstrative. General Diedericks, commanding the Czechoslovak forces in Siberia, urged the sending of more troops and a speedy advance on Irkutsk, the possession of which by German deserters and Bolsheviks cuts the Trans-Siberian Railway and isolates the Czechs in the Urals and on the Volga. The new Government of North Russia is perfecting its organization and has declared for the reestablishment of local governments, suppressed by the Reds, for the resumption of the alliance against Germany and for the restoration of the eastern front. The Bolsheviks were recognized in Germany to have about run their course and there were reports that Lenin and Trotzky had fled from Moscow to Kronstadt and that Germany was planning to throw troops into Petrograd. The Soviet Government has issued a proclamation declaring that the Russian Republic is in danger. Bands of armed peasants are reported marching on Petrograd from surrounding districts. They declare they are starving and that the Red Guards have stolen all their food.

Noyon, the southern hinge of the German line in Picardy for which the French and Teutons were battling on August 20

The German newspapers show much perturbation over the situation in Russia as it affects Germany.

A Week in the World's News

U-BOATS BUSY OFF OUR COAST. German submarines continued their activities throughout the week off the New England and Carolina coasts. On August 10 mustard gas oil was liberated near Smith Island off the coast of North Carolina. Six men of the lighthouse crew on the Island were gassed, but none died. On August 12, the Navy Department reported that a destroyer had sighted a submarine off the Virginia coast. The submarine submerged and the destroyer dropped depth bombs. Oil spots were afterward noted on the sea. On August 12 a submarine torpedoed the Norwegian Freighter Sommerstadt, twenty-five miles off Fire Island on the Long Island coast. On the following day the American tanker Frederick R. Kellogg was sunk off the New Jersey coast. Seven men of the tanker's crew were killed. On August 14 the coal laden American schooner Dorothy Barrett was set on fire by shell fire when twenty miles from Cape May, N. J. The firing brought two submarine chasers and two seaplanes. When they came in sight the submarine submerged. Bombs were dropped near where the enemy disappeared. On August 15 the American schooner Madrugada was attacked near the Winter Quarter Shoal off the Virginia coast. The British steamer Pennistone was sunk by a submarine 100 miles east of Nantucket. One engineer was killed. The British tanker Mirlo was torpedoed off Cape Hatteras on August 16. The Navy Department was reported to be planning a more thorough patrol of the fishing banks and the coastwise trade routes. Stirred by the sinking of fishing vessels, the fishing interests, after a meeting held in Boston, applied on August 15 to the Navy Department for protection. Their appeal pointed out that since the U-boat advent scores of companies in Gloucester, Boston, New York, New Jersey and elsewhere had restricted activities, with the result that the quantities of fish brought in had been considerably below normal and prices had been raised in many instances to a point where it was impossible to substitute fish for higher-priced meats, as urged by the Food Administration.

On August 16, a British tank steamer in a running fight with a submarine 300 miles off Nantucket, fired 27 shots, one of which struck squarely, and flames burst from the side of the U-boat, which was thought to have sunk at once. The tanker was hit twice.

The total Allied and neutral shipping sunk by enemy submarines during July amounted to 270,000 tons, compared with 534,839 tons sunk in July, 1917. This radical decrease in losses is doubly significant when the increase in merchant marine navigation resulting from the American shipbuilding effort is considered. The Entente nations constructed during July a tonnage in excess of 280,000 to that destroyed during the month by enemy operations.

GERMAN LOSS IS 6,000,000 MEN. The total of German losses from the beginning of the war to the end of July, 1918, are understood to be 6,000,000, according to Paris newspapers. The figures include 1,400,000 killed up to the beginning of the German offensive last March. From March 21 to June 17 the Germans are said to have lost 120,000 killed alone.

FOOD RIOTS IN JAPAN. The high price of rice, the extreme prosperity of the upper class, the meager wages of the workers all united to bring about in Japan serious riots, the worst since Japan was opened to the commerce of the Western nations. Troops were required to suppress disorders at Kobe, Osaka, Nagoya and even in Tokyo. Rice stores were pillaged and much material damage was done; the mob giving especial attention to the property of the wealthy. On August 20 the Imperial Government seized all stores of rice and put the grain on sale. The riots subsided.

GRAFT IN GERMANY. Amsterdam dispatches, of August 18, told of the conviction of a director of a munitions concern, Herr Victor Karl Adels, for extorting money from the government and for evading a proper income tax. Herr Adels was said to have made in three years by 'crooked contracts more than $1,375,000. He was fined $375,000 and sentenced to six months in jail.

FINLAND WILL ELECT A KING. The election of a King of Finland has been fixed for September, and it is thought probable either the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg or Prince William of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen will be chosen.

KAISERS PROCLAIM WAR TO THE END. Kaiser Wilhelm and Kaiser Karl meeting at German Headquarters were reported, on August 15, to have pledged themselves and their peoples to fight the war to the end, declaring that the war must continue because the Allies will it so. Admiral Von Hintze, German Foreign Secretary, answering Lloyd George's assertion that Germany had refused peace six months ago declared that nothing was known in German circles of any such proposals, and that "there could be no question therefore of a refusal by Germany of any reasonable peace proposals." The Admiral's statement was looked upon in some quarters as a peace feeler. The consultations of the two monarchs were reported to have resulted in an agreement whereby Austria sent a certain number of divisions to the Western front in return for which Germany agreed to Austria's plans of settlement of the Polish question.

BULGARIA'S CZAR AT DEATH'S DOOR. Some time ago an Amsterdam dispatch said that King Ferdinand of Bulgaria was suffering from melancholia and that an expert in mental diseases had been summoned. It is now said, under date of August 16, that his illness has taken a turn for the worse, and that he is in a critical condition. His reported illness is also said to camouflage his practical internment in Germany, Berlin hoping by holding him, to keep Bulgaria in line.

HAYWOOD AND COMPANY GUILTY. In the Federal District Court in Chicago, on August 17, after a four months' trial, a jury in 65 minutes found guilty of conspiracy to harry the nation in the prosecution of the war, "Big Bill" Haywood and 99 I. W. W. associates.

FOUR MONTHS AHEAD. General March, Chief of Staff, announced, on August 17, that over 1,450,000 troops

Solving Life's Problems

LIFE is a great reservoir of stories. The King of the Shillibers is a piece of life written up. In next week's Christian Herald you will learn how Big Bill Ledyard solved two of life's problems for two people.

Dr. J. H. Jowett opens the month with another of his wonderfully comforting spiritual sermons: this time on "The Passing of the Burden."

Dr. Francis E. Clark, the famous founder of Christian Endeavor, and a world-wide traveler, has made for the Christian Herald's readers an up-to-date Survey of the Mission Fields, which shows just how the war is affecting these great spiritual enterprises. Dr. Clark is optimistic, and believes that all things will be guided for good by the Divine Ruler, and that our missions will be in the front line of the advancing hosts of Christianity which are to conquer the world.

And last, but not least, another artistic page of very striking pictures in rotogravure, dealing with "Snapshots of the Great War."

Mrs. Housewife Feathers Her Nest

By W. Livingston Larned

COMPETITORS, in the same line of business, were surprised and perplexed, when Mr. Randolph, of Randolph & Allen, Housefurnishers, suddenly rented the floor space next door and filled every nook and cranny of it with rather odd furniture.

Moderate-priced sets for bedrooms, dining-rooms and parlors were segregated, each in a specific chalk-lined space. Moreover, the furniture was distinctive in pattern; it was nearly all cream-colored. Beds were not standard width. Tables were invariably round.

There were three cars of this furniture and other merchants in town guessed nine ways from the middle, as to Randolph's reason for loading up during war time. It seemed a perfectly preposterous thing to do.

But the mystery was cleared two months later, when five rows of four-family houses, on Hamilton Place, were complete and ready for occupancy. These structures had been erected for mill-workers engaged on important Government jobs. New plants were being erected and men drafted from all over the country. Housing them had been a far-sighted policy.

Mr. Randolph's addition contained special sets of furniture perfectly adapted to the sizes of rooms in those four-family houses. Tables were round because square corners do not work out well for cramped quarters. The beds had been ordered for the same reason. And every one of the interiors had been finished in a cream-colored tint. Randolph sold out his stock in an incredibly short time and ordered more. He had simply anticipated a likely market. He had learned that the four-family houses were to be built.

This illustrates the progressive spirit of the modern housefurnisher. Conditions have made it essential for him to "look ahead." It's true of every other line of business—why not housefurnishing?

We wish to cite another case of shrewd business management. In a farming district of a prosperous character, the popular weekly farm journal, bought and read by almost everyone in the county, began running a series of stories on housefurnishing and period furniture. These stories were illustrated with line drawings of appropriate goods.

Knowing that they would carry considerable weight and that there might well be a reaction, the largest local merchant put in stock articles alike or very similar to the line used in connection with the series of descriptive stories. Then he advertised locally that this furniture could be seen at his place in duplicate or could be ordered through him. He even had line reproductions of several styles, made from the farm journal feature, and ran them in conjunction with his advertising. Women particularly answered this piece of business wisdom.

War has made some notable changes in merchandising. For one thing, many large city merchants complain because hosts of men are called away to smaller towns by the demands of labor and classified draft. Salaries are larger in many localities remote from the "Big City" appeal.

It has been found that the average family, in making this move and in starting life virtually over again in a new environment, does not take its furniture along. Experience teaches that moving such articles is a costly experiment. The railroads discourage it too. So furniture, particularly, is sold, and when the new home is occupied, a new equipment purchased. What at first seemed "good enough" in housefurnishing, proves makeshift later on, when the husband has settled comfortably in his job—and finds that he likes the quiet of the village. His children have greater freedom. His wife makes likable friends. More than fifty per cent of the time, this family "stays put," and never returns to city existence.

One reason why the housefurnishing line is apt to remain fairly firm is the substantial salaries received by the man of established ability. He is getting more than he ever did in his life. There is a greater demand than ever before for pianos, fine silver, musical instruments and jewelry. People have the money to spend—the great and increasingly powerful "middle class." And they are spending it on their homes.

It is a part of modern civilization to "like pretty things about the house." Even in periods of financial stringency, if a man spends a dollar at it, it will be for better furniture, more comfortable accessories of all kinds, for his little nest. And, after all, furniture is an investment. It is handed down from generation to generation. That first important expenditure is little when the future of the purchase is considered.

And sentiment enters into furniture. A Western girl married a young chap from the East. He went out there, wooed and won her and it was decided that they should settle in his home town because of his established business. This girl had been given a handsome black walnut bed, of the old régime, by her mother. It was precious to her. She insisted that she could sleep comfortably in no other bed. It cost exactly ninety dollars to finally land that bed in the new home in the East, but the sum was cheerfully paid.

There is no finer, more interesting business than that of professional housefurnishing to a community that is appreciative and encourages the best. For the good taste of its ownership finds reflection in every home and in every individual life. Sometimes it is necessary to coax people to keep abreast of changing times. A house has been completely equipped and there appears no logical reason to buy additional goods. Just how some merchants go about stimulating dull markets and sleepy communities is a tribute to the trade in general.

One store introduced a novelty room, with complete furnishings that were changed every week. A carpenter built a neat enclosure on the ground floor, fitting it out with real doors, windows, etc. This place would blossom forth as a modish dining-room, appointed perfectly and in touch with all that was new and different. A dining-room set was moved right in but the "dressing" did not stop here. That dining-room was ready for someone to move in and have a meal. There were cut flowers in bowls on the sideboard. Fruit was displayed temptingly. Crockery occupied its wonted position. There was delicate china and exquisite silver service. Curtains hung at the windows.

A local photographer made a large print of the setting and this was placed upon an easel in the show window, with a hand-printed card explaining the exhibit and inviting the village to inspect it. This photograph, by the way, was reproduced in small, half-tone form on letter paper and went out as a mailing piece each week. Note the character of appeal:

"We invite your attention to our Special Display Room. In it will be found a replica of the very latest in furniture, glassware, lamps, etc. The model is an adaptation of styles set by great New York and Chicago stores. Every woman earnestly desires to have her dining-room modish and up-to-the-minute. It is here that guests are super-critical. However satisfied you may be with your present dining-room fixtures, we are quite certain you will be interested and benefited by a visit to The Style Room."

Indeed, it proved of genuine constructive help to the community, since it kept women posted on the correct styles, forms and spirit of modern housefurnishing. But its influence on sales was equally agreeable. Women, inclined to be opinionated and adverse to buying new things, came around to the shopkeeper's viewpoint, and did away with "old junk." For furniture does outlive its usefulness and beauty in time. This is particularly true of dining-rooms and guest-rooms.

The Style Room of the store we mention managed to find some new method of dressing its show place every week. Here were introduced the novelty lamps, and bric-à-brac, rugs, carpets, wall-paper, etc. A fully-equipped kitchen was the delight of the town for a week.

A Western housefurnishing shop hit upon a very clever scheme for attracting attention to its large show-window. Twelve period displays were employed, beginning with mission and running on through the French decorative school to the massive furniture of certain Colonial days. Not only was the furniture correct as to period, but a local printer made up cards explaining these periods and giving historical data. The window became, virtually, a "School of Period Furniture" and was carefully followed by almost every one of any consequence in the town.

This study of various schools of furniture is really fascinating when one goes into it, and comparatively few persons are well informed on the subject. There would be more buying of fine pieces if knowledge were more generally distributed.

There is the story of the wealthy but uneducated Western backwoodsman who, having recently married, wished to furnish a new home for his blushing bride. He went into a large Chicago housefurnishing store and made known his wants.

"What is it to be . . . Adams, or Sheraton, or Heppelwhite, or Chippendale, or . . . ?" began the polite salesman.

"Whoa, thar!" broke in the impatient Westerner. "I want some tables and beds and chairs. I'll let the Missus buy them other things you mention."

Modern advertising of places like Hampton Shops has done much, incidentally, to make people appreciate the value and niceties of beautiful housefurnishing. The publicity is handsomely illustrated and the copy educational. Stimulating imagination in a community stimulates sales. The thing is automatic.

Your smart housefurnishing shop holds special sales and introduces attractive reasons why goods should be purchased. The room for the boy or girl coming home from school—from graduation. The room for the Father who likes—and needs—a den. The room for the unexpected guest.

We are reminded of the house that employed a man as a sort of "social salesman." This expert watched the society column of local newspapers and was alert to timely personal notes of every description. If a new house was scheduled for building, he made it a point to see the architect, and, through him, meet the owners of that house. He worked with them in equipping the home. If a girl was expected home from college, after protracted absence, he gave suggestions to the Mother for the creating of a dainty bedroom, all as new as silk and as modish as the market afforded. Modern salesmanship is largely a matter of helpfulness and cooperation.

I happen to know a housefurnishing man in a drowsy, picturesque little Southern village. He is an old chap now, with snowy hair and a disposition that has been sweetened by toleration of all human frailty. He loves his shop. It is at once his life and his ambition. He could retire with ease, for he has amassed a goodly share of honest profits, but shop and man have become so welded that I am quite certain one would fade without the other.

It has been this man's business principle and precept that there is no greater asset to a housefurnishing store than well satisfied customers. In many

Mother had fixed up a special room for the sweet girl graduate talks with him, I find that this opinion is a hobby. He thinks it more true of his line than of others.

Women are natural enthusiasts, once they are aroused. If Mrs. A. takes sudden pride in a music-room, if she dresses it neatly and fills it with little intimate, personal touches that the manufacturer is forever devising, she will pass that interest and enthusiasm along to Mrs. B. and Mrs. B. will want a music-room, too. She will want her home to measure up to the best standards of anything in town.

John Wanamaker has humanized business by just such intimate relationships. Even the advertising

The Unharmmed Cross

A SERMON BY REV. JOEL B. SLOCUM*

TEXT—I Cor. 13: 13. "But now abideth love."

A GREAT many things are going, these days; old traditions, antiquated machinery, obsolete methods; but love remains. Love continues because it comes the nearest of anything to a predicate of God. There is only one word in the English language that can be used as a synonym of God and that word is love. "God is love." That is the shortest and at the same time the sublimest definition of God. As long as God exists, love will last. God is from everlasting to everlasting. So is love. Love had an example. That was Jesus, the Son of God. Love has a symbol. That is the cross. The cross was lifted up between man and God, and on it Jesus died for all the people of all the centuries. As long as God and love are inseparable, so long will the cross remain. Love cannot be killed unless you can kill God. The cross cannot be obliterated, because it is the sign of the most magnificent transaction that was ever conceived in the mind of God and executed by his divine will.

After the earthquake in San Francisco, it was discovered that one heap of stone, which was all that remained of a noble church edifice, was surmounted by the unharmmed cross that formerly adorned the lofty spire. The people who had been accustomed to attend that church assembled about the ruins and worshiped God. Just before the benediction, they lifted up their sorrowful and yet grateful voices in that majestic hymn: "In the cross of Christ I glory, towering o'er the wrecks of time."

IT seems strangely significant that there have been so many incidents that illustrate the sacredness and protection of the cross. Particularly has this been true during these past four years in the brutal devastation of churches and cathedrals in the war-swept areas of Europe. Letters from correspondents and published photographs have testified to a number of well-authenticated cases where the cross seemed to be the only thing or one of the few things that remained untouched in the general ruin roundabout.

Chaplain Tiplady, in his remarkable book, "The Cross at the Front," devotes one chapter to "The Untouched Cross." This cross he found in a shattered village in Flanders. To quote a few sentences from his fascinating narrative: "A ghastlier sight never met the eyes of Jeremiah. The roof had fallen through, and the white clouds looked down upon the debris. The floor could not be seen for fallen stones. The figures of saints had been blown to fragments. Nothing had escaped. The walls were pitted with shrapnel like a man with smallpox. Suddenly something caught my attention, and I looked up. There before me stood a large wooden cross bearing a life-sized figure of the Saviour. It stood intact—the one thing in the church undamaged and untouched. Everything had gone save Jesus only. The church was in ruins about him, but he was untouched. Amid the fiery blast of bullets he had remained with arms outstretched, interceding with God for a ruined world. And no bullet had touched him."

IT is this idea that I wish to stress this morning; the thought that whatever else is being smashed by the relentless havoc of war and by the no less heartless iconoclasm of religious anarchy in a skeptical, materialistic age—whatever else is being trampled upon in the mad panic of our present-day revolution, the cross and all that it includes still stands, unharmmed and imperishable, "towering o'er the wrecks of time."

But all people have not welcomed the story of the cross. As far back as the time of Paul, men laughed at the preaching of the cross and called it foolishness. And why? Because the cross cuts into the complacency and selfishness of men. Because it points down at the horrible sinfulness of the human heart as well as it points upward to the immeasurable love and forgiveness of God. It was the story of the cross in the preaching of the apostles that pricked the hearts of the multitudes and caused them to cry out: "Men and brethren, what shall we do to be saved?" That which was the great, moving motive of the Gospel message in the early days of Christianity will continue to be the appeal by which men today shall be summoned to their highest possibilities in faith and service.

While I am not slow to recognize a certain amount of truth in the popular talk of the hour, to the effect that there must be reconstruction and readjustment to meet the conditions of the new time, still, I confess my impatience with that cocksure and yet superficial twaddle that is being constantly released from certain hot-headed hucksters of morality who would have us think that the church has utterly failed in its mission and that the only salvation of the church is to throw overboard everything that it has hitherto cherished.

THERE are certain things that we shall be glad to surrender. Many of these things have actually prevented the church in its honest desire to reach and help the masses. We shall probably be able to get along with considerably less formalism in the pulpit and less unresponsive, self-satisfied, do-nothing-about-it-ness in the pew. We shall all welcome the arrival of reality in the place of nebulous speculations and hair-splitting discussions as to the astounding differences between tweedledee and tweedledum. But there are two things that we shall not be able to improve: Christ and his cross. Happy for us if, instead of trying to formulate some kind of a religious program that leaves him out, we shall reverently undertake to learn who he is, with a view to a closer partnership in the daily tasks of heart and hand.

For nineteen centuries the cross of Christ has been a storm-center—a vortex of conflicting opinions; or, to use another metaphor, a crag rising out of the angry sea. The winds and waves have unceasingly assailed it; but, as secure as the North Cape or Gibraltar, it stands unharmmed and unmovable, the impregnable foundation of our faith, the everlasting refuge from every stormy wind that blows.

It has been said that Horace Bushnell, whose theology did not give the cross a conspicuous place, expressed, on his death-bed, his fear that he had been too liberal with this great doctrine of the atonement through the sacrifice of Christ. The statement has been made that the noted theologian put his hands together in simple faith and committed his soul to the Christ, "who his own self bare our sins in his body upon the tree."

Practically the same thing has been related of Henry Drummond, whose views of the vicariousness of the work of Christ had not been regarded as conservative. Conscious almost to the moment of his death, he requested those about him to sing some of the grand old hymns of the church. When they came to this one:

"I'm not ashamed to own my Lord,
Or to defend his cause,
Maintain the honor of his word,
The glory of his cross"—

a glory crept into his face as he exclaimed: "Ah, that is the best of all!"

So there seem to be two periods when men are not inclined to trifle with the cross: the first one in the early years of faith, and the second when they are face to face with the reality of the great adventure. There is, unfortunately, a middle time when people are either swept from their original moorings, or, what is worse, they deliberately cut themselves adrift. "Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things that were heard, lest haply we drift away from them."

THERE has never been a time when people needed more security of anchorage than now. Fierce are the storms that assail our faith. The night is dark and we are far from home. But, as Tennyson has reminded us, "Well roars the storm to them that hear a deeper Voice across the storm." As on tempest-tossed Galilee, Jesus came out of the storm into the boat of panic-stricken disciples, so now he comes again. As of old he brought calm to the sea, so again he moves silently, majestically and soothingly among troubled souls.

He has the supreme right of way among the sons of men. He earned the right by the cross. The cross is, therefore, the stairway down which God comes to men, and at the same time the ladder by which man climbs to God. Let us thank God that in all the assaults of men and devils the cross remains unharmmed. Whatever else we dispose of, we must keep the cross; else we shall be lost in the hurricanes of doubt and despair that are falling upon the world.

There are many motives that exercise control of our efforts. Some people are living chiefly for wealth; others for fame; others for social position; others for mere pleasure; others still for the good they can accomplish and the help they can render to the cause of humanity and God. Paul expressed the predominating ambition of his life when, writing to the fickle Galatians, he said, "But far be it from me to glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through which the world hath been crucified unto me, and I unto the world."

"O Love that wilt not let me go,
I rest my weary soul in thee;
I give thee back the life I owe,
That in thine ocean depths its flow
May richer, fuller be.

"O Cross that liftest up my head,
I dare not ask to fly from thee;
I lay in dust life's glory dead,
And from the ground there blossoms red
Life that shall endless be."

The Soldiers' Confession—A Story of the Camp

IN July, 1916, I was asked to go for a fortnight to the Canadian soldiers, who were encamped at the great camp at Valcartier, not many miles from Quebec. One night—I shall never forget it—it was the last night but one—I spoke in the Y. M. C. A. tent to a body of men soon to pass over the ocean—line upon line of closely packed soldiers in khaki; strong serious men rolling out the standard hymns of the English-speaking race, "Abide with Me," "Stand Up, Stand Up for Jesus."

I pleaded with them to give their hearts to the Saviour, and not to be ashamed of him who died for them. I remembered something I heard the Rev. Sydney Selwyn tell many years ago. "Men," I said, "men, I want you to do something for me!" There was instant hush. Every face looked up with curious interest. "Now look here, I am going to repeat to you five letters; and I want you to repeat to me five words. You understand? As I say the letter, you all answer with a loud voice, the word. Now I will say the letters and you say the words."

J — Jesus
E — Exactly
S — Suits
U — Us
S — Sinners

Eyes all around were moist with inexpressible emotion, and here and there tears dropped silently. They were no longer heroes. They were no longer soldiers of romance. The glamour of war had vanished. They were just hungry souls, needy souls, yearning souls, souls for whom Christ died.

Next night was my last. It was Wednesday, August 2, 1916. The great canvas auditorium was crowded with soldiers, Protestant and Catholic, English-speaking and French-Canadians all. I told them once more of Christ the living King, ever able to save and keep, and then I reminded them of the words I had given them the night before. "Now, men," I said, "I want you to do one thing more for me. It's the last thing I shall ever ask you to do. As I give you the five letters, I want you to repeat after me the five words which I shall give you. Now, altogether!" And altogether, as in a tumultuous antiphone, the voices answered mine:

J — Jesus
E — Eternally
S — Saves
U — Us
S — Sinners

And as the words rang out, I said: "Louder, Louder!" They repeated them with ringing voices. "Louder still!" And far, far away over the parade ground and the tented spaces of the adjacent camps, men must have strained their ears, and wondered as they heard in the night air the words rolling out in triumphant unison.

Valcartier's Camp of 1916 is gone. The city of white beneath the Laurentian Heights has vanished. The men who tented there that summer have long since crossed the ocean, and in many cases their bodies lie "Over There," where

In Flanders' field the poppies grow
Between the crosses, row on row.

But never will the writer forget the quiver of buoyant hope that passed through that mass of soldiers, soon to go forth in the deathless cause of liberty and right. DYRON HAGUE.

Hidden but Not Separate

SUNDAY, September 1. Ps. 30:7. "Thou hidest thy face." Rom. 8:35. "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" There can be a hiding while there is no alienation. The face may be hidden but there is no withdrawal of the presence. There may be mist, and cloud, and darkness, but the Lord has not gone away. Events may be perplexing, but his love abides. Our understanding may faint while the heart continues her sacred communion. The light may tarry, the Life is here!

There is no one so blind as the one who claims to see everything clearly. Who has not met the trifter to whom everything is plain? He has the key to every lock, the answer to every riddle! And this is the knowledge that "puffeth up." It is a very dry and unperceptive thing. It lacks the softening moisture of humility and reverence and awe. It wants the liquid humor without which the eye can have no vision.

God hides his face! It may be that there are some things that would never come to any life or stature if it were not for the influence of the darkening cloud. There are many ferns which would never unroll their beauty if it were not for the damp, cooling ministry of the shade. Who can grow ferns in the dry light of the garish day? And there are precious ferns in the realm of the soul which would never appear in strength and loveliness were it not for the hiding of the Face. There is patience, and meekness, and humility, and modesty, and there are the fine delicate ferns we call reticence and reserve. What is character like if these are wanting? And it may be that if there were no "hiding," no shadow, no cloud, these most precious virtues and graces might never adorn the soul: or if they did, they would be so feeble as to immediately wither away "when heat cometh." But when He hideth his face the twilight that falls upon us is the shadow of the Almighty. J. H. J.

The Quest and the Quiet

MONDAY, September 2. Ps. 55:6-8. "Oh that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away, and be at rest. Lo, then would I wander far off, and remain in the wilderness. I would hasten my escape from the windy storm and tempest." To Job the thought of the grave was pleasant. In such a mood Shakespeare wrote, "Tired of all these, for restless death I cry." It was in such a mood the psalmist longed for wings. But this is not a noble or a manly thing to sigh for. God's saints have not waxed valiant in flight, but in fight. It is far better to long for strength rather than for wings. Our duty lies here and now—rest comes later. Happily, there is such a thing as rest in the midst of labor, quietness at the very heart of agitation. Mr. Beecher, incomparable poet-preacher, once spoke of a Christian's privilege and power of prayer as like a sea-gull's power to rest upon the surface of a stormy sea, knowing that at any time it can rise above the waves, having wings with which to defy the storm.

Hydrographers tell us there is an undercurrent in the sea that is never disturbed. However high the waves may roll, there are depths which are never stirred. Symbols are these of the peace that floweth like a river, of the calm that is their heritage who dwell in the secret place of the Most High. A missionary during the Boxer Rebellion in China wrote: "Here I am in the midst of enemies, danger ever nigh, death threatening, yet strangely at peace. I feel as little perturbed as if I were in bed in the dear homeland. I do not know why, except that my Saviour is my Keeper, keeping mine and keeping me." That servant of God had no longing for wings. He would not have escaped, even if he could, from the windy storm and tempest. He had read further into this psalm. The psalmist got beyond his longing for wings, as is evident by his testimony: "He hath delivered my soul in peace from the battle that was against me." C. C. A.

The Seal of the Spirit

TUESDAY, September 3. Eph. 1:13. "Ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise." When the government of the United States puts the seal of its treasury on a certain piece of paper, it imparts a value to that paper which it did not possess before. By means of the seal the authority of the government is transferred to that paper, and the paper becomes an instrument of trade: it has buying power. The Bible bears the stamp and seal of God's truth on every page: it is made self-authenticating. Let any one read or hear its messages, and put them to the test by acting upon them, and he will know that its words are truth and life. When people hear the Word of God preached, they may not at once be impressed with its divine authority. It may seem to them only the word of some interesting person who is speaking to them. But to this Word the Holy Ghost adds his almighty force in the hearts of men. He enters their hearts at the time when they hear the Word, and impresses them with its truth and reliability. The believer becomes convicted by this Word of his sins, and is again assured by the Word of God's grace. The seal of the Spirit is placed on his own heart, and he is made sure of possessing God's grace and favor, sure of things which he cannot see, as sure as if he already had the substance of those things. He is sure that the hope which God holds out to him in his Word is not a vain imagination, a beautiful mirage that has been conjured up before his mental vision, but a well-guaranteed fact of the blessed qualities of which he receives a foretaste. Fire in the Soul

WEDNESDAY, September 4. I Kings 18:24. "The God that answereth by fire." When the prophets of Baal failed to bring the fire down to consume their sacrifice after an all-day struggle, then Elijah called upon God in only a momentary supplication. Immediately the fire fell and all the people cried, "The Lord, he is God!" Elijah was only one wandering evangelist besides the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal. But standing true in this hour of great exigency, when the whole kingdom of Israel seemed at stake, he won a victory that has been transmitted to all the ages. Luther, a lone preacher before the powers of Rome and Austria, was no greater hero than this prophet of God. One man with God has always been a majority, and fire from heaven in Old Testament times was always proof of the one eternal God.

When the soul feels the flame of God's Spirit burning up the offering of consecration, the baseness of evil, purifying and cleansing away all iniquity, how natural to cry out, "The Lord, he is God!" His fire makes the red, like crimson, whiter than the snow, leaving nothing of the old man of sin, but making all new in Christ Jesus. Even the water and rocks yield to fire as the blackest sins yield to purifying love, which burns up the dross of base desire and makes the mountains flow. A pulpit on fire with the truth burns its way into the hardest hearts. Even our Lord's mild words, in the minds of the Emmaus disciples, made their hearts burn within them as he talked with them by the way. Pentecostal tongues of fire today would set the world aflame with divine power instead of the lurid burnings of war. Every one may find the fire of God in a moment of consecration. The surrendered man touches the flaming battery and can do all things through strength divine. Oh for the fire that touched Isaiah's lips, that attracted Moses to its burnings and flamed in baptisms on Pentecostal morning! E. W. C.

The Healing Christ

THURSDAY, September 5. Mark 2:1, 2. "And again he entered into Capernaum after some days; and it was noised that he was in the house. And straightway many were gathered together. . . and he preached the Word unto them." Just as in the "coast cities" Jesus could not be hid, so at Capernaum he was the unhidden and unhidden figure. There are things which in their very nature are self-revealing. There was a boy who stole a music-box and accidentally touched a secret spring, when it began to grind out a tune. There are odors which can not be concealed. Life can not easily be hidden. The farmer's boy, sent into the field to plant pumpkin-seeds, who chose rather to sit down in the shade of a tree and read a story, got rid of a good half of the seeds by planting them all in a single hole. Two weeks later, as the farmer came that way, life was its own detective. What was it in Jesus which drew the multitudes to him wherever he went? Was it not that he gave the people what they needed? They wanted help and he helped them. They wanted to be preached to—not at. They wanted their questions answered and their problems solved. The people's wants are over the same. It is recorded that He "preached the Word." What Word? The Word of life, of grace, of hope, of life abundant.

Religion is a life. The religion of Jesus is a "living well" which "springs up" of its own inherent energy, to everlasting life. The fact that Jesus was a great Physician further explains why he could not be hid. A single case of healing without charge, a single permanent cure of a baffling disease, would spread his fame abroad through all the land. There is recorded in this chapter such a case. It is unique, and yet so characteristic it deserves our attention. There was a helpless man, but he had a helpful group of friends who brought him to Jesus. It is written that "seeing their faith" he healed the man. An apparent case of vicarious faith. Can one man's faith save another? Let us not read the words too hastily. "Seeing their faith." The sick man himself was one of those who had faith. But his friends' faith helped his faith, and it may well be called a cooperative miracle. Such a miracle has its legitimate successor in the cure of a blind man in a mission hospital in China. Six months after he was discharged from the hospital, he led back from his distant mountain home a company of fifty blind folk for treatment. And they were all treated, some of them successfully, in the name of the healing Christ. C. C. A.

Suffering for Christ

FRIDAY, September 6. John 16:3, 4. "These things will they do unto you, because they have not known the Father, nor me, But these things have I told you, that when the time shall come, ye may remember that I told you of them." It is a rich consolation to persecuted Christians to know that the Lord exonerates them from all blame, and that he fully understands the true cause of their persecutions, at which the Christians themselves oftentimes can only guess. Christ is altogether on the side of his despised confessors, and these latter must not overlook his powerful alliance, in which they stand as his witnesses before men. The enmity which professing Christians meet from unbelievers is not directed against their persons so much as against their great Ally, and against their connection with him. The world has always hated Christ, and always will hate him. But it has never overcome him with its hatred, and it never will. Christ makes his people the sharers of his own shame and disgrace. As he bore our afflictions and sorrows, so we must now bear his ignominy. Such suffering is only to the Christians' honor. Let them remember that the disciple is not above his master. Christians who suffer for their profession of faith suffer not as evildoers, but for truth and righteousness. Such suffering has the promise of an exceedingly great reward. The world with its fierce opposition to the truth as it is in Christ is after all only playing into the hands of the Christians. It creates an opportunity for Christians to heap coals of fire on the heads of their enemies. After it has exhausted all its resources of malice and revealed its wicked heart, after it has fought to its own exhaustion and accomplished nothing, the Christians turn around and offer to the despairing world that which makes for its peace, the reconciliation with God through Christ. Also the persecutions which Christians suffer must work together for their good. They are serving a King who wears a thorny crown but is a King nevertheless. He leads them through their strife unto victory. W. H. T. D.

Napoleon's Conversion

SATURDAY, September 7. James 4:14. "For what is your life?" There are moments when one reviews the pathway of the past and the possible journeyings of the future. Napoleon on the island of St. Helena reached such a pivotal point in his career. It was there he viewed some of the great mistakes in his life. He saw the greatness of the Christ and the littleness of himself. Standing on that lonely island, with his hands behind his back, gazing at the deep, dark waters of the solemn sea, he reviewed his brief but momentous life, comparing it with the life of the Saviour. Jesus lived and died for others; Napoleon lived for self and ambition. His many mighty victories in battle failed to comfort him now. The buried millions of soldiers seemed to rise up to condemn him, while other millions of living sufferers sang a song of sorrow in his ears.

He saw that Christ, the Prince of Peace, was growing stronger in the love and regard of mankind; that millions today would die for him, though he passed away eighteen centuries before. He said: "Alexander and Caesar and I have founded great empires upon force, but Jesus alone founded his empire upon love. No other human is like the Saviour of the world; He is more than a man. I must be visibly present to electrify my soldiers, but Christ's influence stretches across the chasm of the centuries. He asks the human heart for himself and forthwith the demand is granted. Time, the great destroyer, is powerless to extinguish the sacred flame of love in believing hearts. This proves to me the divinity of Jesus Christ." Only in Christ could he regain what he had lost and rise to become a subject of Christ's kingdom. E. W. C.

Is Civilization Christless?

ONE of the few notable books lately issued dealing with the spiritual aspects of the great war is a volume entitled "Collapse of Christless Civilizations." By Richard Cameron Wylie, D.D., LL.D. It has an especial interest for Bible readers for the reason that it takes a view which, while thoroughly in accord with Scripture, seems strangely to have been overlooked by most writers on this subject.

Dr. Wylie emphasizes the great principle that every nation carries within itself the seeds of its own destiny—the causes that will ultimately lead to greatness and endurance, or to national disintegration and ultimate destruction. Yet no nation is urged on against its will. "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve," is the divine injunction to the governments of earth, as it was in the day of Joshua, and upon that choice their future depends. National acceptance of and obedience to God's laws mean national life and blessing; while deliberate rejection and disobedience mean an end in due time to all the nations that forget God.

In the Second Psalm there is an applicability to conditions in the world today that cannot be mistaken. This grand Hebrew song places in our hands the key to the destiny of the nations. It is Dr. Wylie's view that, no matter in what period of the world's history a nation may exist, or on what continent it may be located, "unless it adjusts its relations with the divine government in accordance with the fact that Christ is King, it will be broken to pieces." The Psalm recognizes the fundamental principle of democracy. Rulers of all ranks are presented in their official capacity, bearing their responsibility for national insubordination or indifference to God's rule.

Reviewing the history of the Christless civilizations and their downfall, we find the same principle of responsibility proclaimed by the prophets and seers. They warned the great states and cities of the past that, unless they repented, they must perish. That the root of all national sin is forgetfulness of God is convincingly attested. Passing down to our own time, we find the fact becoming more and more recognized among students of the Gospel that "the one imperial thought" it presents is that the Lord Jesus Christ is rightfully the Ruler of nations. Dr. Wylie goes farther and declares: "The proofs advanced show that his enthronement is an accomplished fact, that he is now actually swaying his royal sceptre over this world, and that the nations are unwilling to receive and acknowledge him as their King."

In the administration of Christ's government, nations are viewed as "real entities, not mere imaginary or artificial pieces"; they possess a moral character, have their existence in the sphere of Christ's moral government, and are subjects of moral law; consequently their success or failure depend upon their attitude toward Christ as King and their obedience to his laws. Throughout the Bible he is revealed as Prophet, Priest, Mediator, King. "The government shall be on his shoulder. . . . His dominion shall be from sea to sea." And with the acceptance and establishment of his sovereignty, all blessings follow.

For nearly two thousand years, the Kingdom of Jesus has been growing in the hearts of men. All who have come under his beneficent rule have been blessed. But while this is true of individuals and groups, the same cannot be averred of nations and governments. The charge frequently made still stands unrefuted, that no nation or government has ever yet given Christianity a trial by the practical application of the principles laid down by the King of Nations, Jesus Christ. "Is it not a waste of words," Dr. Wylie continues, "to urge upon men that they as nations are under obligation to him as King? . . . There is a deep-seated conviction in the minds of men that such is the case—that nations, too, are moral beings. If the State is something which may claim devotion, it is surely something of which the Divine Ruler takes notice and with which he reckons in his moral government."

What is needed, the author contends, is a new conception of the State as an organism, a moral entity, possessed of moral qualities and with far-reaching moral responsibilities. Such distinguished authorities as Daniel Webster, David Jayne Hill, Hugo Grotius, Wheaton and John Bassett Moore, have each maintained the view of the State's moral duty and responsibility. To claim rulership by divine right is usurpation—robbing both God and man. Political sovereignty belongs to the people if it belongs anywhere on earth, and the tendency of advancing human thought and intelligence affirms this. They have the right to delegate it to whom they will. Supreme sovereignty, however, belongs to God alone.

The author of the book believes that in the present war God's voice is thundering forth his judgments upon the world for its godlessness. He makes no charge against the Church, although admitting that it has failed to preach national righteousness. He recognizes the high ideals of our Government, and the noble sentiments of our President when he declared that the world must be made safe for democracy. There is a divine side to democracy, however, as well as a human side. Authority vested in the people is placed there by the Almighty, and the people, thus clothed, are placed under the rulership of Jesus Christ. And this principle must find expression, if democracy is to be made safe for the world.

The Road to Berlin

SECRETARY BAKER has been formally advised by General Pershing that the First American Field Army has been created, General Pershing retaining command of the army as well as of the entire expeditionary force for the present. The only statement of the location of this American front given is that it is "south of the Marne." Presumably this means a part at least of the long line from St. Mihiel to the Swiss border, where American troops have been put in at intervals during the last few months. The extent of that front has not been disclosed, nor has the definite strength of the army been given. The advices indicate that it comprises, however, five full corps, which means approximately 1,250,000 men.

The American sector includes what always has been considered the logical road to Berlin for French advances. It was across lines now held by Americans that the French struck in 1914 before the plunge of the German army through Belgium localized the war in Northern France. While the enemy is still in Northern France it may be that no major attack can be attempted through these gateways; the campaigns in Picardy and at the Marne, however, are aimed at forcing him back until the opportunity comes to drive at him, and it is much more than possible that it will be over the American lines that the real thrust at Germany will be driven home.

The American force is not only the great factor on the Allied side in driving power, but it is the only rapidly increasing factor on either side, and it is destined to be the determining factor of the war. The straightest and shortest road to Berlin leads from the American lines, wherever they may be. Whatever may be the road to Berlin, it is a safe prediction that the Yankees will lead the march along it.

The Grain Harvest

GIFFORD PINCHOT relates how, while he was addressing an audience of agriculturists, he happened to venture the opinion that it took about three years to make a skilled farmhand. An old man promptly spoke up and said: "Ten years." Mr. Pinchot now knows that the old farmer was right, and that to make a farmer capable of directing the work of a farm takes very much longer. The popular misconception about farming is one of many mistakes which the war is forcing us to revise. It has become a specialized profession, calling for ample training, long practical experience and business ability.

Yet there are in all lands good farmers, plenty of them. All over the world, the grain harvest is now under way. In many countries, the reports foreshadow a considerable increase over those of a year ago. Although the Italian and Swiss harvests give poor promise, France, Holland, Great Britain and Scandinavia will be fully up to the average, and Canada considerably above it. Reckoning on a five years' average as a percentage basis, the United States will harvest in rye 185 per cent of the average crop, 122 in barley, and 115 in spring and winter wheat; Canada 171 in rye, 122 in barley and 115 in wheat. In England, great care has been taken to stimulate increased production, as well as to protect the crops, and good results are expected. France, too, has worked hard under specially trying conditions, and makes a good showing, above last year, which is made still better by the excellent crops in Tunis, her North African dependency. Nothing is predicated of agricultural results in Russia, Austria or Germany.

On the whole, the prospects are that the food situation among the Allied nations and also among most of the neutrals will be considerably better in the coming months. Our farmers are urged to plan now for increased wheat planting by at least 7 per cent, in order to give assurance of an abundant yield in 1919.

The Copper Cent

THE announcement from Washington that 445,000,000 one-cent pieces were coined by the Government in the fiscal year 1918 lends interest to a compilation by The National City Bank of New York regarding the country's growing demand for these little coins, of which the 1918 output was the largest on record.

The bank's statement on this subject shows that the number of one-cent coins manufactured by the mints of the United States from 1793 to the end of the fiscal year 1918 was 3,463,000,000, while the number issued in the last six years is, in round numbers, one billion. The number of one-cent pieces coined never touched the 100,000,000 line in any year prior to 1907; the annual average from that time to 1916 was nearly 100,000,000 per year; in 1917, 213,500,000 and in 1918 445,228,201 pieces.

The number of one-cent pieces coined from the beginning of the Government to date would, even if all were in existence and circulation, allow for each individual about 33 one-cent pieces. Of course, the number actually available is far less than this, for it is quite probable that out of the 3,463,000,000 one-cent pieces coined by the government not more than about 2,400,000,000 are now in existence, or at least in circulation, making the present average per capita for all the people of the United States about 23 one-cent pieces.

The Charm of a Good Story

"KING of the Shillibers," beginning in this issue and concluding next week, is a gripping story of lower life in the great city brought into touch with the big Billy Sunday revival. All happens in a day and night, and what happens is plenty. For the reader it is a rare day with the graceless scamp of a hero in his troubles and a thrilling night of love, reunion, repentance and marriage. The writer, George Gilbert, is new but fast finding a high place in the leading magazines.

"That Girl From Orchard Street," a novel, immediately to follow, is the best war story we have been able to find in a long search. It will rank among the very best yet written. It will run eight or ten weeks in liberal installments, beginning September 9. It deals with the food service and spy system, and is vibrant with thrills from start to finish. The heroine is a small-town American girl who "makes good" at the front in France under severest conditions. Through courage under trial she wins honor and a worthy lover. The author of this novel, Courteney Savage, presents a thorough inside knowledge of the work of the American Committee for the Devastated Regions of France, and fascinating incidents of actual experience at the front are pictured powerfully. The story has not a dull line, and it is all well worth while. The illustrations by the popular illustrator, Nimms, add still further to the strength and clearness of the plot.

Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, inspired by the greatest of topics, is now writing his greatest story. It will appear serially in the Christian Herald during November and December. "All the World" is the title and the story will deal with the possibilities of world reconstruction after the war. It is being written up to the minute. Fortunately, a forecast has been furnished by the author which gives a clear idea of the lines along which the story is being written. "My general plan throughout the story," says Dr. Sheldon, "is to picture, through the adventures and experiences of the different characters, the Reconstruction of the world by the power of the Gospel. I plan to put these young people everywhere—Mexico, Turkey, Africa, India, Europe and America—and with a united Church here at home and a consecrated pocketbook help build up a new world. One of the points I want to make is the appeal the Christian world must make for money, as much to build up as we have spent to tear down. We are spending $2,000,000 an hour on the war. That is more than our own American Board gets in a whole year for missions. My appeal to the Church in the story is the appeal first for spiritual unity of action, second for a consecration of all young life in the Sunday School and Church to missionary effort, and third the giving of vast sums of money to carry on the reconstruction. That, in very condensed form, is a synopsis of the story. With it I have actual letters from live missionaries in different countries to weave into the narrative, and their consent so to use them.

GEORGE GILBERT

[What tyme Lady Margette had alle but finished ye chapel she had coued for ye safe returne from war of her liege, Lorde Albert of Purtyse, her stores were so low she fain would ask her people to helpen her. Then came nobles, kernes, churchmen with gyftes to put forward the good work. And Lady Margette, at even, pleased, sate her down in the new fane to count over the gyftes and then did fall on sleep, being overspent with her labours. Then did Robert le Jongleur, that famous clown, peer in, and, seeing all that others had done to please his lady, his heart waxed full sore; for, whenas all others had many a talent to cast into that treasury of love and service, the clown had but this one talent—that he might win all people to him by his quirkies, boundes, smyles and twistings of ye bodye—Legend of Robert le Jongleur.]

BIG BILL LEDYARD, King of the Shillibers once—best of those men who, when the sideshow or concession barker has delivered his lecture, leads the way, tolling the crowd in—crawled out of his upper floor hall room bed in a dilapidated boarding-house left undisturbed by the demands of business east of Broadway, far downtown. He crawled out to face the inevitable that peeped, in the form of a note, from under the door of his place of abode. Bill knew how the note read. For days he had been dodging to prevent Mrs. Prentiss, the landlady, from saying it to him.

Bill let the note remain where it was while he dressed. The room was very, very cold. As Bill huddled into his baggy clothing, coughs racked his great frame. His eyes, fever-bright, burned under overhung brows. His breath came and went, unevenly, with great labor.

"Th' cough's gettin' in closer'n closer," he told himself as he adjusted his frayed purple tie under a once-white collar wing. His big, rawboned shoulders stooped. His beard was two weeks out—ragged, patchy. But his skin shone through it, ghastly white, with a sheen that told of many days of acute famine. When you dodge the landlady, you miss meals—dodging her and the inevitable. Bill had missed dozens.

As he completed his toilet, Ledyard's mind went back, as it was apt to at such times, to the days when he had been truly the King of the Shillibers. Then he did not have to lie up for the winter in mean hall rooms and have notes poked under his door, for in those old days he it was who was always picked to act as bellwether for the crowd before the biggest of the sideshows with the largest of tented communities. His lanky form, guileless face, kindly blue eyes, wrinkly clothing, modestly-worn derby, a bit out of date, set him off as being a retired farmer, out for a day's enjoyment. As the barker—the ballyho boo—finished his talk and threw up his hand, seemingly in an impressive gesture to give ultimate point to his peroration, really to tell Bill he had sensed it was time to act, the King of the Shills, eager to catch the cue, would move forward, nudge a man or two nearby gently and, with the most engaging smile imaginable, say:

"Let's go an' see what it's like, brother."

OR, if it was a young man and his sweetheart that he had set his mind upon to go with him, from the top seats down to the arena-side when he was acting as shilliber for the grand concert at the show's close, he would catch them as they were yielding to the ballyho's urging and in need of only a mental shove, and to them would make the same apparently casual remark, at the same time starting down, from seat-tier to seat-tier, to the seats below reserved for those with concert tickets. Thus he would start the movement that separated the outgoing home-bound goats from the concert-going sheep, and so powerful is well placed example that he was worth to any show many, many times the sum paid him. For always after the King of the Shills came the crowd. Who could suspect a middle-aged, mild farmer, kindly of manner, fatherly, when he piloted a honeymoon couple to the concert, of acting as a lure?

That was Big Bill's one talent—his ability to draw a crowd after him when the ballyho boo had done his best. Other shills had it, a little, but Bill Ledyard was supreme, because he not only knew wherein his one talent lay and whereof it consisted, but he nursed it, perfected it. Even when laid up for the winter, he practiced his bit each morning, painstakingly, before a mirror, to start the new day. So now, facing the inevitable, he took his place before the bleared glass and posed, as if he were in a crowd's midst before a big concession tent; giving due attention to each shade of expression on his face, to the tip of his now battered derby, to the harmless knot of his frazzled tie, to the slant of his imitation pearl stick-pin, to the set of his very worn and intensely sober coat and vest, to the very hang of his crumpled trousers and to the wrinkles in his bogged-out shoes. Then, guileless wonder on his face, his smile engaging, his gesture alluring, his eyes beaming—confidence-compelling—he turned and said, to an imaginary audience:

"Let's go see what it's like, brothers."

Bill knew how the note read

The wonted mummery nerved, warmed him.

"I got th' old dope wit' me yet, an' when th' spring comes, gentle Annie, I'll be in shape again to shill fer the ballyho boo," he consoled himself, turning to face the inevitable.

Bending, he picked up the note, stuffed it into his pocket without reading it, coughed convulsively, wheezed to recover his spent breath, opened the door and faced the—

HER name was Mrs. Prentiss. The landlady often is the inevitable—when it is not the land-lord.

"Good-mornin'," he greeted. "I got your note, an' you c'n have th' room. I was a-goin' t' move t' day anyways. My baggage is all moved al'ready. Good-by; many thanks fer favors past."

He was gone, racking himself often as he went. "I declare," Mrs. Prentiss said to the first floor front later, "I'm a' most sorry I put 'im out, but I've got to live, and I'd let 'im stay a month free 's it wuz."

Drink for years had worked its will on Big Bill Ledyard. But constant practice at his one fleeting bit of acting had kept him perfect until he had been hurt in a clem very early the fall before, and that row on the circus lot had been a bad one. Seeking to hold back the crowd that had rushed the sideshow at the clem's height, Ledyard had been surrounded, squeezed, all but killed. The great pain from the injury to his chest had made him slip from his good intentions, and added potatoes had been his portion since. With the easy-going munificence of his kind he had waxed reckless, wasting his small substance. Before midwinter it had vanished. Losing caste with his familiars by borrowing, he had suffered rebuffs and had drawn inside his shell of cynicism, resolved to last until spring and the up-going of the big tents. And now he had come to the end.

Stubbing his way down the street, Bill found that the sun was gazing into his building-made canyon, into whose upper levels a few vagrant snowflakes sifted, to turn to water before falling. It was winter trying to peep into the house of spring, from which April once had evicted him.

BIG BILL had moved his baggage, as he had told Mrs. Prentiss, but he had moved it bit by bit to the pawnshops. His diamonds that he had kept for winter wear, his good fur overcoat, suits, haberdashery had gone to satisfy his thirst. He had nothing left now but his old shilliber suit, empty of pocket. It and his one talent—ability to draw a crowd after him—were all that remained to Big Bill Ledyard, the King of the Shillibers. And of him, too.

He was not hungry that morning. But unaccountably he felt stronger than he had for two days back, yet he coughed oftener. And if he burned one moment, he felt cold the next, as the shrewish April wind sought the weak spots in his thin shilliber armor of summer clothing. He wished now he had kept one suit of underwear—

Another cough-fit racked him. He leaned against a police box to regain breath. A newsboy, crying his wares, thrust a paper under Big Bill's nose with the sarcasm that the little merchants of the curb will enjoy upon occasion and offered him an "uxtry." Ledyard, casting his eyes drearily over the headlines, found one that caught his attention:

"Great crowds at the Dundee meetings in the White Tabernacle."

And then the newsboy jerked the sheet away.

"S that th' Dundee that pitched fer th' White Sox in '90?" he asked.

"Whyn't ye ask me som'ing easy," the Cherub of Argus chirruped. "I wasn't borned then. But Dundee was a balltosser oncet, they say, but that may be on'y just to get him on th' page th' foremost."

ASUCCESION of coughs racked Ledyard again. A film crept over his vision at the spasm's close. When Bill could see again he discerned something round, hard, nearing his face. He pushed at it, missed it, blinked at it, too weak to strike at it anew. Then he straightened with a thrill. He knew what it was—the butt of a policeman's club.

"Are ye glued there?"

a rolling voice queried. "If not, move; or ride in the rubber-tired waggin. On yer way!"

Big Bill shuffled along, glad to escape arrest, his eyes more and more fever-bright. Why had he asked a little boy who had played on the White Sox in a year long ago? He must be getting qucer in the head, he thought in a moment of self-pity.

"On yer way yet," the voice of authority persisted behind him. He was going north, Bill was.

A window display caught Bill's eye in a little tawdry shop. Spring suits, shoes, hats!

"Why, th' winter's gone," Ledyard reflected. "An' it's on'y a few weeks ahead, now, till the big show opens in the Garden, and then in a little while the shows go on the lots."

He plodded on, unsteadily, persistently—jostled by hurrying folk, dodging traffic at crossings in some miraculous fashion.

"I'll go out wi' th' first good show that has a concession that wants a shill," he solaced himself. "Till then I'll do odd jobs, sleep in parks, anything to hold myself up—who knows but—"

foreman: "Riverside Hospital wants you on the phone."

She knew what it was; had been expecting the call for hours. She had gone to work that morning with the idea firmly in mind that it might be the last day's work she would be able to do before the end came. So she had been working at double speed on that last day, in order to have as much as possible to pay the undertaker when the time came. And now it had burst upon her—the great crisis of girlish trouble. Luckily she had done well that day at her work. And it was almost quitting time.

At the factory stairway's foot, having received the news she feared to receive, Mona paused, cheeks flushed with the unwelcome excitement of the occasion, but her loyal eyes showing shadows below their lower lids. Her shoulders drooped a bit inside the fairly well made jacket of brown. Her skirt of a good black, her hat with modest but fine blue feather and light brown felt body, and her high-heeled gipsy boots told of a girl who was able to spend not a little on dress.

As Mona emerged, a man detached himself from the knot about the boot-black's stand across the way at the corner. Like all the others of that loafing group, he was well shaven, well dressed, in well-pressed clothing. As he came, neat black overcoat unbuttoned and flaring easily back, he was making a pretense of manicuring his nails. His cheeks were firm, pink, his jaw very square. A forceful curbstone type!

The girl made as if to pass him, but he thrust himself before her.

"Don't stop me, Jim," she pleaded; "it's the end for mother—"

"Gee, Kiddo," he said, his swaggering assertiveness fading to contrite deference; "I'd no idear 'twould be so bad. I thought youse was a-steerin' me 'bout her bein' laid up, so youse could get out o' dancin' wit' me. So I waited fer yo' t' come out."

"Never mind the dances—and—and all that's gone with them, Jim," she said, her mind more than half way from present matters. "Just now I'm in a hurry, because I've got to go clear uptown, out there to Riverside Hospital, to see her before she—"

Mona leaned toward him. He gave her his arm, glanced defiantly over the way to see if any of the manicuring, well-dressed young men about the boot-black stand were laughing at him behind his back. He was pleased to see that although one or two wished to make some remarks derisive of him for being so soft to his girl, after having boasted how he was going "to bring her to time for keeping away from dances," they did not. The members of the gang all feared Jim Beldren, sport, meat-ticket lightweight boxer and gambler—feared what he would do to any one who by look or gesture put him to ridicule and so questioned his leadership of the crowd.

[Thus dyd ye jongleur untill at ye laste, yborne adowne wyth langoure, he dyd hym sit ta reste at ye laydy's fecte, smylyng uppe at hys Beloved Laydy—in hys eyen she was brythe and fayre. But she, roused by hys loving work to her uppleasen, had seen hys best mumming, yet held her eyen, nor let hym see it at that tyme.]

SCREENED in for the last scene, Annie LaRue picked at her coverlet, waiting. Presently before her stood Mona and a young man. Finding the girl weak, Jim had escorted her all the way to the hospital; fending for her on crowded streets and on the ears.

"Is he your young man?" the sick woman inquired.

Beldren was not the sort of "young man" the mother meant. But he was all the "young man" that Mona, living the hurried, hard-driven life she did, had been able to find. She was his "girl" and if there had been many others before (and might be others after her), why, that was according to his code. But Mona was the one of them all who stirred him to the depths, that satisfied him with voice, manner, form, complexion. Her wavy brown hair, pretty pink cheeks, bright brown eyes, were natural, not made up for special purposes. Somehow she had managed to preserve the country health of her mother's people in the swirling, hectic life of the teeming city.

The invalid, stirred again, spoke: "Let me see him closer, Mona."

Beldren, swayed for once by an idea akin to chivalry, moved to her side. The sick woman gazed at Jim steadily, with all the powers of her fading vision. "Mona," she whispered, "come to the other side of the bed."

Obediently the girl yielded to her mother's whim.

"Clasp hands," the mother whispered again, "and promise me to be true to each other."

"Well, why not, to oblige a sick one?" Beldren asked himself, clasping Mona's hand over the weakening form. Nor was he the less pleased to feel by the grip of Mona's strong, deft fingers, warm and soft, that she was grateful for his complaisance. The energy of her thankful touch thrilled him.

Beldren, at a sign from the girl moved out from behind the screen and sat down on a chair that the nurse brought. The sound of low voices behind the screen, where Death was becoming impatient, no doubt, at the delay, came to him faintly. Then it ceased, so far as his ears could tell.

"Bend lower," the failing woman had said to the girl.

The fresh young face, like a blossom hovering over a brown and fallen leaf, came closer to that of the woman who was facing the final curtain.

"Your father's name was Ledyard," she said. "Since you picked me up on the street and got me in here I been meaning to tell you the truth—"

"But how is it you are named La Rue—"

"Ledyard was only a shilliber for a ballyho boo. LaRue was the biggest ballyho in the business. I was a side-show woman—It's getting dark, Mona—but stick to your man—and—and marry him—The other girls with the show told me to keep my man and they married theirs, but I was too—and so I ran away with LaRue—Yes, mother; I'm going to bed as soon as the men come in from doing the chores, so I can kiss daddy good-night—good-night, dearie—Mona, LaRue is dead. I never saw Ledyard after I ran away—all right, mother; good ni—"

Mona's sob called the nurse behind the screen. She steadied the weeping girl out to Beldren.

"She's only gone off into one of her weak spells," the nurse said. "She may go soon, or possibly not till after the turn of the night. If you are nearby I can have you phoned for—"

APETITION from a nearby cot took her attention. While she was getting the patient a glass of water an orderly came down the aisle. Beldren tugged at the orderly's coat sleeve.

"Say, lad," he said, "is there a place nearby where a gent and his lady can wait till called in here? Her mother's dying."

The orderly, quickly viewing Beldren, gasped in awe.

"It's Lightweight Jimmie?" he whispered, admiringly.

Beldren nodded, pleased that even in there his fame had made ripples.

"Saw you box at the Forty-eight Club," the orderly went on in monotone, one ear and eye out for the nurse's return. "No; there's no real place—you might go just inside the door over there in Dundee's White Tabernacle. Always a few seats vacant near the top at the back. I'd find you if I was given the word; glad to help a fellow like you, Jimmie, any time."

Beldren nodded an easy: "Thank you." And added:

"There's one iron man for you if you do it—"

"Don't mention money to me," the orderly protested, "in a case like this—for Lightweight Jimmie—aw, you know how 'tis."

His whisper ceased. Over his shoulder

Mystery of Arizona Ruin

FOR many years two pairs of holes in the walls of the celebrated prehistoric Casa Grande ruin in Arizona have given rise to much speculation not only on the part of tourists but of archeologists also. The holes are about an inch and a half in diameter and are bored through walls four feet thick. They occur in pairs, each pair on opposite sides of a great central room. The holes in each pair are in line with each other, so that one standing in a dark first floor room behind the central room may look through the innermost hole across the central room, and through the outermost hole at the sky. One pair points due east, the other pair points north at a declining angle. The interesting people who built this most ancient of pueblos have left no traces behind. One can only imagine by analogy from better known races of a later day what their civilization may have been. That they were a religious people and worshippers of the sun is the opinion of the best authorities. Recently an interesting theory has been advanced to explain the mystery of the holes in the wall. According to this theory these holes form what might be called a seasonal clock. Twice a year, once as the sun works north and once as it works south along the eastern horizon, it rises in line with the eastward-pointing holes and for one morning, for possibly three minutes, throws a bar of light into the dark inner room. From this the ceremonial calendar could be dated, and certain festivals would fall on the same day year after year. One is reminded of Stonehenge, one of the most famous ruins of England—with its Temple of the Sun, and a calendar in stone for the measurement of the solar year, where the sun at its summer solstice shone down a long alley of stone monuments upon an altar placed in the center of a series of circles of stones. We see through these holes the ghosts of a vanished race who built great cities, practiced useful arts, and worshiped the sun in their anxious search for the God who made it and them. Without the Book and the Christ what better could the people do than worship the sun? God uses it as a symbol of himself. The psalmist says: "For the Lord God is a sun." (Ps. 84:11.)

Rescued from Niagara Falls

A TRAGEDY was averted at Niagara Falls on August 7 by the rescue of Gus Lofberg, a Swedish sailor, and George Harris of Buffalo, by heroic life-savers. The scow on which the men hung over the edge of death was being used in the river opposite Port Day, where a channel for a power plant intake is being dredged out. The current is swift, and a tug was holding the scow in position to take a load of sand brought up by the sandsucker. The top rope parted and the scow with the men aboard went rapidly down the stream. At the head of the Upper Rapids the scow veered toward the Canadian shore, and entered a channel that led directly to the Horseshoe Falls. It seemed for a few moments certain that the scow would be carried over the cataract. The fire departments from both sides of the river were called out and the life-saving crew was hurried up in a truck from Youngstown. Just before dark a line was shot across the scows and later with the aid of searchlights an effort was made to send breeches buoys out to the wreck. Searchlights were kept playing all night to encourage the men. At 2 o'clock in the morning all effort to rescue the men was abandoned until daylight should aid them. An electric light was rigged up to tell the men that they had not been deserted for good. At daylight the rescuers renewed their efforts. They the mothers of America, addressed to Mrs. Woodrow Wilson. This is the letter: "It is from the mothers and women of France that I send you these words to prove our gratitude for the comforting and brotherly support that these young Americans bring us with such noble enthusiasm, who are not afraid of leaving their families, their country, and their hopes to come to our rescue. Alas! I myself have given my beloved son to my unhappy and cruelly tried country, and I can understand the pain of those who see their sons go so far, so very far away. Tell hope of you is steadfast, knowing, that as ye are partakers of the sufferings, so shall ye be also of the consolation." (II Cor. 1:7.)

Hottest Day on Record

THE hottest day on record in New York City was August 7, when the thermometer registered 102 in the shade. This was two degrees higher than the previous high mark, which was made on September 7, 1881. There were seventy-six sunstrokes, causing a number of deaths. The city parks were thrown open all night, and hundreds of thousands, especially from the poor tenement districts, tried to get some sleep, and all those who could went down to some of the beaches to get some of the ocean breeze to keep them alive. Within a year's time New York has experienced the smashing of the record for cold (December 30, with the mercury at 13 degrees below zero, seven degrees colder than ever known before), and now the record for heat at 102. The heat wave was general. The temperature at Toledo, Philadelphia, Harrisburg, Pittsburgh, Baltimore, Washington and Richmond reached 106 degrees. In Michigan, Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri it was nearly as hot. The blistering heat injured the corn crop in a number of sections. Refuge from the deadly heat of a summer in Palestine is thus used as a symbol of Christ: "And a man shall be as rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." (Isa. 32:2.)

Record Lunch at a Launching

THE launching of the Quistconck at the Hog Island yard, near Philadelphia, was an event worthy of the presence of the Chief Executive. The Quistconck was the first of 180 ships which are to be fabricated in the big yard, which with its fifty ways will soon be making a big splash every few days. The launchings will be continued until the carrying power of America's commercial fleet is equal to the opportunities and the necessities of her commerce and her army. The name Quistconck was chosen by Mrs. Wilson, who is reported to have agreed to furnish a name for each ship launched at the yard. Quistconck is said to be the Indian name for Hog Island. It is much more euphonious than its English equivalent. Mrs. Wilson christened the boat. After the christening the International Corporation entertained the notables present in a luncheon at tables, well screened from the hot sun, capable of seating several thousand people. This luncheon in the numbers participating and in the significance of the event is certainly one of the greatest ever held in the history of the world. There were 25,000 people present at this memorable launching, and it is likely that a fifth of that number sat down at the tables. The luncheon expressed just congratulations at the marvelous power of our mighty government. Centuries ago there was a mighty out-of-door lunch which expressed the miraculous power of Christ to feed the multitudes, their bodies with material food, and their souls with the bread of life. They had no benches, nor tables, nor awnings at that luncheon; they all sat down upon the grass. And it is possible that there were more persons partaking than at the Hog Island event. This is what is said of the numbers: "And they that had eaten were about five thousand men, besides women and children. (Matt. 14:21.)

Ratifies Prohibition

ON August 8 Louisiana, by a vote in the House of 69 to 51, ratified the Federal Prohibition Amendment, which had passed the Senate earlier in the week. When the states began to vote on the ratification of Prohibition there were six wet Southern states; four of those six states that have ratified are Maryland, Kentucky, Texas and Louisiana, the wettest of all, leaving only two in the wet column in the South, Missouri and Florida. When the voting on ratification began twenty-six states had adopted State Prohibition, and only ten more states were necessary to carry the amendment. Since then four wet states in the South, and Massachusetts and Delaware of the wet states of the North, have ratified, leaving only four more wet states from both North and South to secure the thirty-six, or two-thirds, necessary. The liquor men did not think it possible that Massachusetts with its Boston would ever ratify Prohibition, but it did it firmly and quietly. They said that Baltimore with its dominant liquor interests would never allow Maryland to ratify National Prohibition, but despite Baltimore, Maryland did ratify. They said the whisky interests in Louisville would never let Kentucky ratify, but they could not prevent it. They said New Orleans would prevent Louisiana from ratifying the Constitutional Amendment, but it did not. The liquor men can certainly see no hope in these cold, hard facts, which spell National Prohibition. Rapidly the nation is acknowledging this fact: "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging, and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise." (Prov. 20:1.)

shot another lifeline over the scow, and brought the men to shore by breeches buoys. Niagara, as man's servant, furnishes the power that turns the wheels of a thousand industries; as man's master it plays with him in the dancing rapids, and dashes him down to certain death. Science and love in the life-savers stayed Niagara's angry hand, and saved the two precious lives from an awful death—a type of the divine hand that rescues from sin's danger and doom all who avail themselves of its merciful offer. "Who redeemeth thy life from destruction." (Ps. 103:4.)

Unity of Motherhood

A MESSAGE of singular beauty is that contained in a recent letter from Madame M. Barbar of France to them, those mothers, those women with the sublime hearts, how near we are to them in thought and how moved we are at their sacrifice. They are our sisters through suffering and agonizing worries, and we are brought together through the same sorrow. That we will never forget." The letter of this loyal Frenchwoman meets a warm response in the hearts of the loyal mothers of America who are bearing the heaviest of the burdens of sacrifice and suffering and are bearing it with pride. They are leaning on the strong arm of God and on the bosom of the loving Christ for divine consolation, and so do the mothers in other nations smitten with the same sorrow. The motherhood of the world knows what the fellowship of suffering and of consolation is. The thought is thus expressed: "And our der, with the furtive vigilance of his kind, he had seen the nurse approaching. He went about his regular duties.

"The orderly is a friend o' mine," Beldren told the nurse. "We're goin' t' be close at hand, an' if anything goes wrong, tell him; he'll find us."

Together Jim and Mona went out into the early, garish dusk of the metropolitan fringe, jarred by the dins of traffic, pricked out with electric lights and gas lights, split by the shrilling of the newsboys, even away up there in the quieter Riverside section.

"Jim," said Mona, as they came to the corner, where on a vacant stretch of lots a huge roughly-boarded structure, whitened over, sprawled out, tent-like, and before which a crowd already was gathered, "what's a shilliber?"

"A guy what coaxes the come-ons into a concession at Coney. Why?"

"Oh, nothing. Do they have them at circuses?"

"I never was in a circus but in Madison Square Garden, and there was no shills there. They might use 'em out in th' rube towns, where they show under tents, say towns like Philly and Chi. Why?"

"Oh, I—I don't know. Don't ask me any questions. I've got enough to bother me now."

DISCREET male that he was, Beldren forebore to press deeper the lance of curiosity. They paused at the edge of the crowd before the entrance to the tabernacle.

"This is th' place th' orderly said fer us t' wait. This is where Dundee has his show," said Jim. "I seen him shut out the Giants onet—when I was a newsy. I wonder what his graft is in this business?"

A man came out, gasoline-blow torch in hand, from a small tent that was backed up against a straggling warehouse across the street. He lighted a flare before that tent, wheeled and went down the line of others, leaving a trail of flickering yellow lights after him. With the quick wit of the children of the long paves, vendors of all sorts of wares had set up their small, evanescent businesses to flank the fringes of the monster throngs that came nightly to hear the world-famed baseball evangelist. They began to take their stands in their pulpit-like boxes, offering books of hymns, books of sermons, "hot dogs," popcorn, souvenirs. The hit and miss illumination brought out from the shades of an angle of the White Tabernacle a life-size black and white picture of Dundee, which depicted the evangelist in one of his best attitudes, hand overhead, beckoning, pleading.

Beldren glanced about. Clearly the hospital orderly had given him good advice, after its kind. There was no place for them to go "up here in th' fringes," as Jim put it to Mona, that is, no place such as they were accustomed to pass away idle time in.

"There's vacant lots an' horspittles an' rocks an' goats an' highbrow schools and Grant's Tomb an' high-toned flats off below a bit, but no real place."

No, indeed! No place with upstairs rooms for the comfort of waiting people, such as Beldren could have found down below where he and the gang had their habitat—no place where, over an alluring glass of beer, two could make the full moments pass.

THE door of the White Tabernacle opened. The crowd began to surge in. The men in the gasoline-lit booths called their wares.

"Almost like a scene at home when the circus came to town," Mona heard a fat matron murmur to her slim husband at their side going in.

Inside the smell of the sawdust underfoot came up to them, fresh and sweet. As the many, many feet crushed it, the pine particles gave forth their dying aroma, protesting thus against man's devices for defilement. Clumping over benches, newly arrived ushers found their places. Off down in front all was dark; only here and there, closer at hand, an electric bulb glowed to punctuate the darkness, giving light enough to seat the early comers by. Later the great clusters of bulbs would flood the place with white rays.

Mona La Rue and Jim Beldren sat down, on a top tier of seats, just inside the door by which they had entered. It was warm there inside, and a good place to wait for the call, they agreed.

The early crowd went forward, under the usher's urgings. So the two found themselves alone back there, except that the trampling legions filing in passed them several seats away in the main aisle.

"Mona," Jim said, as the girl leaned wearily against him, "I guess it pleased her when I give yo' my fist, eh?"

"Yes, Jim. I could see mother's eyes light up then."

"An' she said t' marry yer young man?"

"Yes, Jim." Leaning closer to him still.

"I've a'most made up my mind t' do it. You're about th' finest little Jane I've seen—"

"Don't, Jim, not now—"

"Yo' been square wit' me, girlie; even give me coin w'en I wuz sick last fall. I ought t' marry yo' an' quit battin' aroun' wit' th' gang."

Her shoulders drooped, tiredly. She nestled still closer to him.

"Yes, Jim; it would be better—for us both—if you could."

His hand stole over to pat hers.

"I wonder w'at th' gang'd say—" He grinned, paused. "At me marryin' an' quittin' ever'thing? Well, anyway, we've made your mother happy, an' that's sometin' to tink about. I never made mine happy, because I never knew who she wuz—But let's not get too wozzy over this. Let's get your mother's case off th' docket first; then we'll see."

"That's the best way, Jim."

"I promised her because—well, because it don't do no hurt to make a dyin' woman smile, and it didn't do no hurt—a little fib, eh?"

"No, I understand—and thank you, Jim."

"I'll see yo' t'ru it, Mona, honest, some way."

With knitted brows Beldren, as the crowd surged in, studied this new problem that he had to confront—studied it with what few shreds of real manhood he had left in him to stiffen him to meet it, man fashion. She had said it would be "better for us both" to be married.

"Better for us both, eh?" Well, that had to be considered. Meanwhile it was tiresome in there, waiting so, and the craving for a drink, for a cigarette, became great. But Beldren had in him the strain of loyalty that the city's gang life creates—the loyalty that makes the children of the paves keep their words, pledged to their fellows in dire trouble. And so he remained, fidgety, but immobile.

Like the King of the Shillibers, Lightweight Jimmy had but one talent in his handful of the counterfeit coin of life, and that one talent was his loyalty—personal devotion—to his friends. With that to brace up his wavering backbone, he found it even possible to smile at himself, as he sat there. He, the leader of the district gang, about to hear Billy Dundee's spiel, while he waited to go with a girl to a hospital later on an errand of mercy! He could see the ironies of the situation in his own odd way.

From behind the boardings far up front the notes of a trombone, the player practicing a hymn tune, came floating out and up to the couple.

"Some guy's tryin' his lip on th' slip-horn," Jim said, by way of information and also to break up his queer train of thought, "an' he sure knows how to make 'er slip, too, Mona."

She nodded. The pulsing notes of the horn were repeating over and over, the phrase: "Come and I will give you rest to your souls."

It was a line from a hymn her mother had sung away back beyond the years when they lived in the country—

If Beldren had glanced at Mona then he would have seen that her eyes were misty. But he did not look. Over and over again he was saying to himself:

"Better fer both o' us, eh? Well, maybe. But what'd th' gang say?"

Training Conscience and Trained by Conscience

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Prov. 20:27; Ps. 51:1-13 (It is suggested that this meeting be led by the pastor)

HOW often we hear people answer, when taken to task for some unwise participation in worldly pleasure, or some treading on the verge of dangerous excess, "My conscience didn't condemn me, and I don't think it was wrong." Of course not. Conscience is a creature of education, and that particular conscience needed training. Conscience is a monitor within us, which warns us away from paths we have been told to avoid, and which suggests to us paths we have been told are well chosen. Somewhere within the treasure house of our mind there is a chamber which holds all the good we have been taught. When we start to live contrary to that good, the memory wakens and conscience speaks. When we face a difficult choice, where good and evil are strangely obscured, conscience points to the good, in so far as we have been taught that which is good. Conscience is not a supernatural force within us; it is but the voice of our better self. The better trained our better self is, the safer will be the leading of our conscience. We owe the foundation of our conscience to our parents, our Sunday school, and day school teachers and our playmates; we owe the development of it pretty much to ourselves. By seeking to do well always, we train our conscience to impel us toward well doing. By seeking to find a justification for the doing of everything we desire to do, regardless of its possible tendencies toward harm, we train our conscience to keep silence or to mislead. We can make our conscience a power for good living and for successful living, or we can make it an excuse for minor transgressions that will lead to greater sins and perhaps to ultimate failure in spirit and in life. Conscience is at best only a guidepost. It is safe to follow it only when it points in the same direction as the one certain guidepost, the inspired Word of God. When the Bible and our conscience agree we are all right; when they differ the conscience has been poorly trained.

Weak Places in Our League to Be Strengthened

Epworth League Topic. 1 Chron. 28:1-10

WHEN a general is given a position to defend, he searches out the weak places and places his best men there. When a man starts to achieve success, he searches his life and heart for the weak places and sets himself to make them strong. A League can not grow and render God good service unless it does likewise. The leader of this meeting can do his League a great service if he is big enough to point out fearlessly the weak places, without taking advantage of his temporary leadership to wreak petty vengeance on those who have disagreed with him as to men and methods. One of the weak places in nearly every League is the presence among the membership of those who will only work well when the work is done their way. There never yet was a person wise enough to dominate an organization. Another weak spot, frequently found, is the presence of those who are constantly critical, who speak with supercilious lips of everything attempted, who do their part as if they were bored, and who never have a sensible suggestion that leads to any accomplishment worth while. Another weak spot is the man or woman who is so full of enthusiasm and energy that he wants to do everything himself. Woe to the League that elects him president! It will die of lack of general exercise. Another weak spot is the good-natured person who permits all sorts of jobs nobody else wants to be shoved off on him. A "Handy Andy" is said to be necessary to every well-organized society, but woe to the society which overloads the jack of all trades; such action means shirking on the part of others, and a society of shirks never conquered any neighborhood for the Kingdom. Another weak spot—a pretty general weak spot—is failure on the part of members to realize their duty and the privilege represented in the obligation to take part in the religious meetings of the League. The member who warns you not to call on her to lead in prayer, or on him to testify, or on either of them to lead the devotional meeting, these are the kind of recruits that an army captain discharges for cowardice, or puts on kitchen police. We all have our points of excellence and we should serve where we can serve best; but we must be ready to answer any call. Unless we are so ready, we are a weak spot that needs to be strengthened. The best remedy for weak spots is a liberal application of the Spirit of God.

Japanese Inspect Our Sunday Schools

RECENTLY twelve Japanese school principals visited America. These schoolmasters received a special welcome by educational and civic organizations. They expressed the impression that America, while busy commercially and in war preparations, was equally busy in social service. In Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Pittsburgh they had opportunity for a study of representative Sunday schools, so that they could observe at close range the relationship between the public school and the Sunday school in the development of a rounded character.

In Brooklyn the party visited the Bushwick Avenue Central M. E. Sunday school and sang the Japanese national anthem. They were interested in the graded work, and the adaptation of program to varying ages.

In Philadelphia they visited business, educational and historical institutions through the cooperation of Hon John Wanamaker, vice-president of the World's Association, the Chamber of Commerce, and Dr. Garber, superintendent of the public schools. In Pittsburgh they were entertained by the Chamber of Commerce, the Board of Education and a Committee of which Chancellor McCormick of Pittsburgh University was chairman. The visitation of Japan and America by groups of educational and business leaders is exercising a profound influence in promoting cordial relations and a better understanding of ideals and problems.

Conquering Evil

The Call to Conquest

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D

JUST as in the international realm there can be no concord between the predatory self-seeking empire and the fraternal and idealistic republic, so too it is in all moral relationships. As the apostle Paul put it in writing to the confused Corinthians, "What fellowship have righteousness and iniquity? or what communion hath light with darkness?" There is an eternal distinction between right and wrong and an age-long conflict between good and evil. No peace is possible, no truce can be granted, in this warfare. Human welfare demands an aggressive Church and a religion which is able to triumph over all the visible and invisible enemies of the commonwealth of God.

The Root of Evil in Selfishness

Jesus' great challenge is to the individual, to deny himself and to crucify his selfishness. There is no case of selfishness more obvious nor more perilous than covetousness. "The love of money is a root of all kinds of evil." "Take heed and beware of covetousness," was the warning of the Master to two brothers who were letting self-seeking kill brotherliness. Again and again he showed the peril which results from the seeds of desire in the heart.

Now, today's lesson is an ancient illustration of aggressive evil challenged by a loyal servant of God and lover of humanity. It is the old story of Naboth's vineyard which King Ahab coveted for a portion of his already extensive palace grounds. The King grieved like a peevish child over Naboth's refusal to sell. The unscrupulous queen found a congenial task in securing the land by trickery and murder. What an old story indeed of the disregard of the rights of the common people by the royal tyrants of the past! It has been matched times without number in the greed of the employers of labor and of the powerful rich in all ages, including the present. Read Micah, especially in the second chapter concerning those who "covet fields and houses, and oppress a man and his heritage." And covetousness leads to murder! In modern industry, it is just as much murder when labor is exploited by capital, when babies are killed by bad milk, or young women ruined in health or morals by the conditions under which they toil that others may have houses and wealth and power. Woe to that man by whom such offenses come!

To such as Ahab, a prophet of God is an enemy! When the man of religion speaks, the profiteer feels that he has been "found out." How completely those prophets were involved in the welfare of their people in all the common emergencies of civic and industrial life! Have their modern successors been equally alert to rebuke entrenched covetousness in high places? Will they allow the poor to suffer in our idealistic day? The answer is found in the Home and Foreign Mission Study books of our churches for the coming year. While we are all enlisted to make the world safe for democracy, the churches are going to study the places where democracy has not yet had its chance even in our own land, and the topics have to do with the workers of the world and the problems of wealth and poverty.

Making Enemies

We cannot conquer evil without fighting it. But evil manifests itself socially in individuals, in institutions and in customs. Therefore it is often absolutely inevitable that we should make enemies. The anti-slavery men of seventy-five years ago made enemies. So have the anti-saloon men today. Any man in any age who has contended on behalf of the abused poor, has incurred the wrath of the rich and great. Jesus said, "Woe unto you when all men speak well of you!" This was said to the chosen Christian leaders in the Holy War against selfishness and sin! They were not to be men-pleasers. They were to hew to the line and let the chips fall where they may. They were to speak out against idolatry, lust, greed and the clutch for power over the lives of others. "Thou art the man" is sometimes the best method, as when Nathan faced David, or Elijah Ahab. Besides, it is impossible for a reformer, or a reforming church, to avoid incurring the antagonism of those who profit by the existing iniquity. So the Christian Church must have enemies, ought to have enemies. The sooner we realize it the better.

It is interesting to notice that our lesson deals with an incident closely related to the civic and political problems of the Hebrews. The land question was involved and the rights of the commonalty against the nobility were involved. The elected elders of the city cooperated in the murder and robbery planned by Jezebel. The "nobles" showed themselves as ignoble as they so frequently have in history. How painfully present are these difficulties today. Men who have been entrusted with political power for the protection of their fellow-citizens play the traitor right here in America. Men whose standing in the church is unquestioned are found on the wrong side in the struggle with the child-labor exploiters or the saloon interests. The most cruel injustices can be perpetrated under color of law, as was the case with Jezebel's plot.

Christian leaders can no more keep out of these affairs than could Elijah stick to "preaching" while the children of God were wronged. Sometimes they stand alone as Elijah did. But in these brighter days they find themselves allied with thousands who believe in righteousness in all human relationships.

Automobile Exports Largest in History

MORE passenger automobiles were exported from the United States during 1917 than in any previous year. There were exported during the twelve months ended December 31 last, 65,792 passenger cars, valued at $51,982,966, wholesale, an increase of 48 per cent. over 1915 and nearly 19 per cent. over 1916. These figures are significant when it is remembered that imports of automobiles have been prohibited during the past year in England, France, Italy and India, that Germany, Austria, Bulgaria and Turkey have dropped from our trading list, and that shipments have been almost impossible to European Russia. Exports of passenger automobiles to the United Kingdom decreased from 14,787, valued at $11,483,675, in 1915, to only 1,349, valued at $1,978,948, in 1917; but the exports to Chile increased from 497, worth $318,913, to 3,937, worth $3,481,061, or elevenfold, in the same period. During the same two years exports to Russia dropped from $5,762,019 to $1,761,388, while passenger car exports to Canada increased from $4,304,718 to $12,401,705. The high tide of sales of army trucks to our Allies was reached in 1915, when 22,094, worth $59,839,303, were shipped. Last year the United Kingdom, France and Russia bought 11,136 trucks, valued at $31,495,087, while all other foreign countries took only 3,211, worth $4,869,686. More than $3,300,000 worth of motor vehicles were exported last year to Alaska, Hawaii and Porto Rico. The exports of passenger automobiles and motor trucks exceeded in value by 50 per cent. last year's exports of railway locomotives and passenger and freight cars, or of all electrical locomotives, machinery and appliances. They were eleven times as great as the combined exports of carriages, wagons, bicycles, motorcycles, airplanes, traction engines and caterpillar tractors, and nearly three times as great as exports of all agricultural machinery.

You Need a Better Tooth Cleaner

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

That Film Must Go

The old ways of tooth cleaning have proved inefficient. Millions of people know that—know that teeth brushed daily still discolor and decay.

Dentists know it. Statistics show that tooth troubles are constantly increasing, despite the wide use of the tooth brush. And authorities know why.

The trouble lies in a film—a slimy, ever-present film. It gets into crevices, hardens and stays, and resists the tooth brush. Nearly all the tooth troubles are due to that film.

Dentists call it bacterial plaque. They know it as the teeth's chief enemy. And the great object of periodic dental cleaning is to scour off hardened film or tartar.

That film is what discolors—not your teeth. It hardens into tartar. It holds food which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. These germs also cause other serious internal infections.

The great object of teeth-cleaning is to keep teeth free from film. All else is almost useless if the film remains. Yet the tooth brush, unless rightly aided, leaves much of that film intact.

Now a way has been found to end the film. Four years of clinical tests have proved it beyond question. It is now embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. We urge you to try a One-Week tube—at our cost—and prove it for yourself.

See What It Does

The results of Pepsodent are quick. A one-week test, in most cases, brings a revelation.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is found to be albuminous. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to constantly prevent its accumulation.

Ordinary pepsin will not do. Pepsin must be activated, else it is inert. The usual agent is an acid, harmful to the teeth.

But science has now found a harmless activating method. Five governments have already granted patents. That method is employed in Pepsodent. Clinical tests, under able authorities, prove that everyone should use it every day.

See the results for yourself. Send the coupon for a One-Week tube. Use it like any tooth paste. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Note the absence of the film. Note how teeth whiten as the fixed film disappears.

You will see results which dental science has for many years been seeking. And you will see, we believe, a way to cleaner, whiter, safer teeth than you have ever had. Cut out the coupon now.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them Into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

GREETINGS to you, Christian Herald friends: greetings from the woodsy hillside where I am writing you this comradely message! I am off on my vacation this week, and that explains why my ears are now full of the music of rustling trees and singing birds instead of the roar of a city's traffic. Oh, how I wish I might have all of you (my neighbors) here with me! If only I had a Magic Carpet, I would transport you; and we would hold—here under the blue sky, with birds calling to us and little gray squirrels laughing at us—our most joyous meeting of the year.

Since this is impossible, can you not picture yourselves here? Can you not see this vivid green hillside, carpeted with ferns and wild flowers? Can you not feel the hush and peace of the woods, and breathe in the odors of a hundred forest scents? Can you not see, far below, through the trees, the broad, blue sweep of the Hudson River; and make out, off to the north, the roof-tops of a little village? You can conjure up all this? You can join me on my hillside?

THAT little village, dear Neighbors, whose roofs twinkle so pleasantly through the trees, is an old friend of mine. And a very badly behaved friend too, until recently: the kind of friend for whom one was always apologizing. For until lately it rejoiced in the record of having more saloons than any village of its size in this part of the country. In all, there were some forty saloons here. Every street bristled with them. They were at almost all the corners. And they were the best patronized saloons I have ever seen: many of their patrons being soldiers from a big army post near by. The condition of affairs was lamentable, for the village was a quaint, picturesque, charming one, otherwise. (All this, of course, was "Before the War.")

Well, what has happened is as amazing and thrilling as so many other war changes. I find my bad little village "gone dry." Not a drop of liquor is to be had in it, not a tipsy man to be seen. The little place has been "brought up standing." And what a transformation! I strolled homeward from it yesterday—I am spending my vacation on the hill above it—with a light heart and a feeling of great thankfulness. All day the wonder and joy were with me, and in the evening, as I sat out under the stars marveling at the glory of the night heavens, I felt that truly "God works in a mysterious way, His wonders to perform." For out of this war—this black night in which we seem to be enveloped—is coming a dawn too marvelous almost for us to grasp now.

It will be the dawn of a better and nobler era: of higher ideals; of greater temperance. This old world of ours is going to be a better world; and we are going to be a better people. We are working out this destiny now, all of us: our boys in France, and we anxious, earnest stay-at-homes. There is not an idealist among us—not even the littlest child but is doing some little "bit" to make life better.

And it seems to me that, of all the ideals being battled for here at home, none is quite so vital as nation-wide Prohibition; and that no War drama could be more thrilling than the transformation of thousands of American villages from intemperate to temperate towns.

In the meantime, here are some true-life accounts of ways in which other towns have wrestled with this world-old problem.

Fighting the Saloons

When I moved to the town of G—, in Montana, there was no W. C. T. U. or any organized force to fight the liquor traffic. So, although there were five churches, there were saloons on all sides of them.

I had been a fighter in the ranks in my Eastern home, and I could not think of "taking it easy" while conditions remained as they were. My first move was to write the National Corresponding Secretary of the W. C. T.

U., to ask if there were any W. C. T. U. organizations in the state. I soon found that there were, got into correspondence with them, and laid the matter before them. Then I went among my neighbors and talked temperance, securing some subscribers to the Union Signal, in order to get people interested and stirred up.

The result was that a national organizer was sent, held some meetings, and organized a Union, which, though small, was a beginning that grew like the "handful of corn on the mountain top," until finally great results were achieved.

There was a time when the outcome seemed very doubtful; when many were on the verge of giving up. But some of us, who were firm believers in answered prayer, went to the Master with the cry: "Lord, we are helpless; but thou seest just the condition of things. Help, or we perish."

Very soon a new spirit was apparent at the meeting, and a W. C. T. U. visitor from the East, who came along just in time, infused us with fresh courage. So we started on again. Three years later, that little band had grown until most of the women in town were members, and our Union was able to entertain the State Convention of the W. C. T. U. We were a very powerful influence in helping vote out the saloon from the state. And this year of 1918—which will see the state-wide prohibition law go into effect—there will be no happier band of women in the state than those devoted women of the town of G—.

MRS. I. Mc F—.

Isn't that a thrilling story of ideals battled for? I want more such stories, so that we may all know just how other communities feel about driving the saloon out, and just what steps they are taking toward bringing this about.

HERE is an account from an Eastern state: again the story of one woman's struggle, but different as to methods.

Winning a Community to Temperance

An ardent temperance woman went to live in a community which lacked two vital elements. There was no social life for the young people; and there was no interest in the Temperance question. Her own boys and girls longed for companionship; and she concluded that many other young folks round about were equally lonesome. But, being a wise woman, she did not betray her knowledge of the situation or announce that she would provide a remedy. Instead, she went into secret council with a sympathetic member of the little W. C. T. U., and together they evolved a plan which is bearing fruit in many lives today.

She lived in a large, old-fashioned farmhouse well adapted for social gatherings; and her daughter, just home from boarding-school, became the right hand of the plotters. Notes of personal invitation were sent to all in the neighborhood (cigibles and non-cigibles) for a parlor social. No one knew what to expect, but the house was crowded. Outside talent gave a short program of readings, etc., bearing on Temperance, and the remainder of the evening was spent in games, music and conversation. There were no wallflowers; every one was made to enjoy something. And, of course, refreshments were served by the hostess.

These socials were kept up, and were the central feature of the life of that community for years; with the result that numbers of young people signed pledge cards, and temperance sentiment was so strongly developed that two saloons were wiped out by petition and the standard of a third was raised. Young people thus had the jolliest of times, too, under the proper auspices; and the whole tone of the neighborhood was improved. HELEN S. P.

I do not think a better method of winning a community over to the idea of Temperance could be devised than the one just given; because this plan also includes a good time in its program. Have you ever tried anything of the sort in your town?

OUR last adventure is also a practical one, although altogether unlike those we have just heard:

A Petition for Prohibition

First, I should like to say how interested I am in the Adventures in Neighboring department. It has been a great help to me, and I know it has to others. I have not had a part in many adventures worth telling about, perhaps, but here is one that may help some town interested in fighting the saloons.

Last year our W. C. T. U. visited the polls on election day and gave out literature. Besides, the ladies made a house-to-house canvass in an effort to get the women to sign a petition for prohibition. This was a very exhausting undertaking. But it was splendidly successful. Nearly every woman signed, and the petition was presented to Congress.

MARY E. BROWN.

This letter-writer lives in Massachusetts. If any Neighbor would like further details about the plan followed in her town last year, I shall be glad to forward to her any letter of inquiry sent her in my care.

Before proceeding to the Forum, fellow-Adventurers, I want to thank all of you for the beautiful and stimulating letters that pour in on my desk every day. I know most of you now, and you have as warm a spot in my heart as if I had known you for many years. If there is ever a question in your mind in regard to anything that appears in these columns, do not hesitate to write me about it. I should now and then be only too glad to receive from you suggestions as to what phases of community life you are most interested in and would best like to hear about. And if there is any topic of the day you would like discussed in our Forum, let me know and I will present the subject there. These columns are your club-room. Don't forget that!

AND now, dear distant Neighbors of mine, I must bid you Godspeed for another fortnight. I have postponed the final date of our Good News Day contest to October first, in response to requests from communities that have not had time to arrange for their Good News Day. So there is still time for every one to compete. Meantime, may this week's Forum open up to all of us endless opportunities for "loving our neighbor as ourselves."

The Neighbors' Forum

Every week I read my Christian Herald through from cover to cover; and how I wish I did know some of my Christian Herald neighbors! I am a shut-in; and I have some very lonely days.

C. G.

To any one who will send me a stamped, self-addressed envelope, I will send directions for a "Nut Party" that is unique and enjoyable, also for a Floral Charade and a Conundrum Social.

NEIGHBOR FROM MONTANA.

It would add greatly to the zest of a "Community Sing" if the singers could be divided into two bands and could get up contests, a prize being offered.

WILLIAM A. SHINN.

Let us not forget the "old folks" in our neighborhood. They are often lonely, and appreciate a bit of cheer.

GRACE A. MANCHESTER.

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: Being much in sympathy with the good you are doing through your neighborhood work, and very especially that branch referring to our soldier lads, I wish to offer a suggestion. If every reader of the Christian Herald who is already in correspondence with a soldier or sailor would, in the next letter to him, ask for the name and address of some neglected, homesick comrade—perhaps his next neighbor in billet, or trench, or marine hammock—and send this name to you, could there not soon be an endless chain of Good Cheer, helped along by the boys themselves? I will start the ball rolling.

A NEIGHBOR.

We are two old ladies, my sister-in-law and I, and are both of us homesick to be called to Heaven. We are very lonely. She is lonelier than I, and a few lines to her would do her so much good, and brighten her life. Her name is Miss Maggie Zimmerman, and her address is enclosed.

M. E. Z.

[DEAR NEIGHBORS: Any letters or cheer messages sent to this dear old neighbor, in my care, will be promptly forwarded to her.]

The Trees in the Meadow

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IT was a weary-looking stretch of meadow land, a sun-baked area of brownish yellow grass that lay out along the drab side of a hill. And because I was tired, after a long, hot walk, it looked very dreary to me.

"I never," I remarked more or less plaintively to myself, "saw such an unhappy-looking bit of ground. There isn't a tree in sight—I don't suppose that a real tree would even consider growing on this meadow!—or a flower, or a shrub. The sun is so burning and fierce here that it's just simply discouraged them!"

The sun was burning and fierce. It beat down upon my uncovered head as I crossed the meadow land—beat down with a merciless heat. And I walked with my shoulders bent and my head drooping from the glare of it.

Perhaps it was because I walked with my head bent that I did not see the little clump of baby trees until I almost stumbled over them. Some species of pine, they were, with hardy green branches that reached up challengingly to the warm sky. They looked cool, and healthy, and sure of themselves. And as I stood in front of them, gazing down—for they were very little trees—I found myself marveling at their courage, found myself thinking of them as real human beings who were bravely meeting adverse circumstances. It almost seemed as if the little trees were speaking to me, as if they were saying:

"The heat of the sun can't kill us! We will grow to be big trees—we will be strong and healthy, we will look up into the sky and laugh! Just because we happened to come to life in a great dry meadow we won't be discouraged! Nothing can beat us!"

THERE, in the midst of that weary stretch of burnt-out meadow land, a little clump of baby pine trees gave me a message. And I walked away from them, away across the yellow-brownish grass, with a brand new point of view—walked away strengthened and encouraged. But it wasn't until a week later, when I was back in the city, lunching with a little friend of mine, that I realized why the message had been given to me.

She was tired and discouraged, my little friend. Her work had been going badly, and she wasn't well, and her personal affairs were running in a way that was very far from smooth. And she had asked me to go to luncheon with her so that she could tell me her troubles—for, when one is troubled, it often helps to tell a bystander one's difficulties.

"The city," said my little friend hopelessly "has crushed me. I've been fighting against the heartlessness, the commercialism, of it for a long time. But, somehow, just now I haven't the strength to go on fighting—I don't want to have the strength. My work! There are many others who are doing better work than mine will ever be! I'm not pretty enough to look into a mirror and feel confident—for being pretty does give one confidence! I'm not well, and yet life's going on, every day, in the same whirl—a whirl that I can't keep up with.

"When I first came to town I used to glory in the struggle. I used to say, of every small success, 'City, I've scored against you!' But now, now I can't! The heart seems to have been burned out of me, and I'm tired. The city has beaten me!"

One who had never been thrown up against the city to earn a living from it could not have understood my little friend. But I had met the city and struggled with it quite as she had. And though I had rather gloried in the struggle, I, too, had known my moments of black worry—my moments when everything seemed useless—when all of life appeared to be nothing but an endless small circle revolving around a dollar mark. And I could understand the crushed feeling that was like a great hand reaching out, to deaden the spirit. And I knew that I must say something to help—something that would make my little friend take hold of the threads of her life and begin to weave it into pattern in the brave way that she had always done.

CURIOSLY enough, at that moment, I didn't find myself wanting to talk about the problems of the city—and its weight. Curiously enough I found myself seeing a sunburned stretch of meadow land with a clump of green little baby pine trees shooting up out of the parched ground. And suddenly I found myself putting the picture into words—telling about the heat, and the blasting rays of the sun, and the rocky soil. And strangely to my own ears came the sound of my voice telling what the trees, if they had been able to speak, would have said to me.

"The heat can't kill us." I repeated to my little friend, "We will grow to be big trees; we will be strong and healthy; we will look up into the sky and laugh! Just because we happened to come to life in a great dry meadow we won't be discouraged! Nothing can beat us!"

We were silent, for a moment, after I had told the story of the little trees, and then I spoke again. Suddenly I felt apologetic. "I suppose that you think I'm being particularly silly," I said, "to tell you anything so—so irrelevant. But somehow the little brave green things, growing there, made rather a deep impression on me. And I can't help feeling that we, all of us, are like trees and flowers and grass, planted in meadows, or garden spots, or in the deep cool woods. And our problems aren't so unlike their problems. Sometimes transplanting kills the hope in us, sometimes circumstances crush our ambition, sometimes environment takes away the faith and joy that should be ours. But sometimes we're like the little trees that grow in a great drab sun-baked meadow, and we grow bravely—looking up into the face of fate and speaking with cheerful defiance. And we say 'Nothing can beat us! And nothing can!'"

My little friend was looking at me with a light in her eyes—a brave light, the light of renewed struggle. And suddenly I realized that God, through a clump of his green growing trees, had given me a message to pass on to her in her hour of need. And all at once I was very sure that the world was a good world, and a fair one. And my hand stretched out across the table and my little friend's hand reached half way across to meet it. And she smiled and said softly,

"Nothing can!"

Nothing can crush us,
Nothing can harm,
If we will always
Whisper this charm:

"Just as a pine tree
Grows from the sod.
So are we growing
Upward to God!"

Among the Workers

REV. JOHN FOX, D.D., LL.D., who has for nearly twenty years so conspicuously and faithfully served the interests of the American Bible Society, a large part of that time as Corresponding Secretary, owing to his health lately presented his resignation to the Board of Managers. The Board has accepted the resignation, and made a suitable and acceptable arrangement for a retiring allowance.

NEVER has there been such an intensive Gospel campaign from automobiles as that of the present season, under the joint auspices of the Y. M. C. A. and the Evangelistic Committee of New York City, and many other agencies working to the same end. The West Side Y. M. C. A. in its own section of the city has had an attendance thus far of 36,000 persons.

THE trustees of Knox College, Galesburg, Ill., have selected for president Professor James L. McConaughy, of Dartmouth College, to succeed Dr. Thomas McClelland. Dr. McConaughy is expected to arrive in Galesburg about September 1 and take up his duties at the opening of the school year.

Equals 89 Eggs

Or 7 Pounds of Round Steak
Yet Costs Only 30 to 32 Cents

The large package of Quaker Oats yields 6221 calories in units of nutrition.

Official figures give eggs 70 calories each, and round steak 890 calories per pound.

That package of Quaker Oats—costing 30 to 32 cents—compares in food units as follows:

It Equals 89 Eggs	Or 9 lbs. Veal Cutlets
Or 7 lbs. Round Steak	Or 11 lbs. Fresh Halibut
Or 7 lbs. Leg of Lamb	Or 12 lbs. Broiled Chicken

These indispensable foods, for the same nutrition, cost from 7 to 10 times as much as Quaker Oats, according to prices at the present writing.

That is why food authorities urge the wider use of oats. Not merely for breakfast, but in bread and muffins, in cookies, in soups.

The oat stands supreme among grain foods—as energy food and as food for growth. It is the richest of all grains in iron.

Yet Quaker Oats—the finest grade—supplies nutrition at 5 cents per 1000 calories.

If it cost $2 per package it would still be cheaper than the average meat food.

Quaker Oats

Just the Richest Flakes

Quaker Oats is a superior grade, flaked from queen oats only. None but the richest, plumpest oats are used in its production. We get but ten pounds from a bushel.

The result is exquisite flavor, which has made Quaker Oats the leading oat food of the world. Yet it costs you no extra price.

Quaker Oats Bread

1 1/2 cups Quaker Oats (uncooked)
2 teaspoons salt
1/2 cup sugar
2 cups boiling water
1 cake yeast
1/2 cup lukewarm water
5 cups flour

Mix together Quaker Oats, salt and sugar. Pour over two cups of boiling water. Let stand until lukewarm. Then add yeast which has been dissolved in 1/2 cup lukewarm water, then add 5 cups of flour.

Knead slightly, set in a warm place, let rise until light (about 2 hours). Knead thoroughly, form into two loaves and put in pans. Let rise again and bake about 50 minutes. If dry yeast is used, a sponge should be made at night with the liquid, the yeast, and a part of the white flour.

This recipe makes two loaves.

Quaker Oats Pancakes

2 cups Quaker Oats (uncooked), 1 1/2 cups flour, 1 teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon soda dissolved in 2 tablespoons hot water, 1 teaspoon baking powder (mix in the flour), 2 1/2 cups sour milk or buttermilk, 2 eggs beaten lightly, 1 tablespoon sugar, 1 or 2 tablespoons melted butter (according to the richness of the milk). Process: Soak Quaker Oats over night in milk. In the morning mix and sift flour, soda, sugar and salt—add this to Quaker Oats mixture—add melted butter; add eggs beaten lightly—beat thoroughly and cook as griddle cakes.

Quaker Oats Muffins

3/4 cup Quaker Oats (uncooked), 1 1/2 cups flour, 1 cup scalded milk, 1 egg, 4 level teaspoons baking powder, 2 tablespoons melted butter, 1/2 teaspoon salt, 3 tablespoons sugar. Turn scalded milk on Quaker Oats, let stand five minutes; add sugar, salt and melted butter; sift in flour and baking powder; mix thoroughly and add egg well beaten. Bake in buttered gem pans.

THE CAPTURE OF JERUSALEM

By REV. A. E. THOMPSON

Pastor of the American Church at Jerusalem (driven by the Turk from the Holy City at the outbreak of the World War). At present Field Secretary for the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief.

"The capture of Jerusalem is one of those events to which students of prophecy have been looking forward for many years. Even before Great Britain took possession of Egypt, there were keen-sighted seers who foresaw the day when God would use the Anglo-Saxon peoples to restore Jerusalem. When the war broke out, there were some of us who were convinced that it would never end until Turkish tyranny was forever a thing of the past in the Holy City. When the city was captured, we felt very confident we could put one hand upon this great event which had stirred the heart of the whole Christian world, and, laying open our Bible at many places in the Prophets, say as confidently as Peter on the day of Pentecost, 'This is that which was spoken by the prophets.'

"The capture of Jerusalem is more than a prophetic event—it is a pivot in prophecy. The Germans might enter Paris and we would weep; but, desperate as that event would be, it would only be an incident in the great panorama of the ages. The flags we love might be carried into Berlin, and how we would rejoice!

But even that would only be an incident. The Hun might again sack Rome, but not one of us could with any assurance put our finger upon any text of Scripture and say it was so written. Constantinople might fall, and a babel of voices would be heard among our prophets. But when Jerusalem was captured, we all said with one consent, 'This is the climax of the ages.' We have entered a prophetic era. We are looking upon the things which Moses, and the prophets, and Christ Himself have foretold.

"The capture of Jerusalem is not the end, but the beginning. Now, if the hour of the passing of the Turk from Palestine has come, it means great things to the Promised Land. It marks the beginning of the end of the desolation. It means also the beginning of the end of the dispersion.

"Again the capture of Jerusalem indicates that we are at the beginning of the end of the declaration of the gospel. The capture of Jerusalem also meant the defeat of German design. And finally, the capture of Jerusalem marked the beginning of the end of all imperialism."

Questions and Answers

O R., Pennsylvania. Just what does it mean to pray in faith? Are we to have faith that God can grant our request; that he will; that he does, as soon as our request is made; or are we to pray until by faith we may know that he hears and answers our prayer? I am referring, of course, to requests prompted by right motives.

This is a question frequently asked by earnest inquirers, who encounter it as a hard problem on the road of Christian experience. The real root of the matter is that we must take firm hold of God's promise, in which he says of the earnest seeker who comes before him with a contrite spirit and a sincere desire for divine guidance in all things: "Before they call I will answer." If a child can accept the promise of an earthly father without question, and nothing doubting, surely the child of God should accept the promise of our Heavenly Father to help us for the sake of his dear Son. A prayer offered in this spirit and with entire confidence that it will not only be heard but, if it conforms to our Father's will, that it will be answered, is a prayer in faith. To pray for wealth, fame, worldly success, or the indulgence of some passing desire would be a wholly selfish utterance, and not the outpouring of a heart that was seeking after the Kingdom. "Seek ye first the Kingdom," said Jesus, "and all things will be added unto you"—that is, all needful things for our life sojourn here. As the promise includes both spiritual and natural needs, it is in the widest sense comprehensive, and Jesus made this clear when he told his disciples that whatever they should ask in his name would be granted. Our prayers for restored health, for safety from impending danger, for relief in famine or other distress, are in line with the divine will, for they are the heart's hurry-call for heavenly aid from him who has promised all things needful to those who sorely need his aid, and his word stands that he "will never leave thee nor forsake thee." Faith begets faith; therefore pray for greater faith, and having prayed in Jesus' name, rest assured your petitions will be heard and that it will be answered perhaps in a way you did not anticipate. He who foresees all things knows your real need, and gives what is best for you, as you will discover later. There are prayers, to grant which would work us more sorrow than good. Pray, therefore, submitting your petitions to his will. One thing more: it is strengthening discipline and helps to increase our faith to give God the glory by acknowledging before the world the blessings of answered prayer. We know of many who love to do this, and who thus become the means of kindling faith in the hearts of others.

L. L. G., Northfield, Ohio. The matter is largely controversial. We do not believe it is our duty to sit in judgment upon others. The Jews are to be won to Christianity by kindness and consideration, rather than by antagonism. Many of the ablest men among them are today more disposed toward recognition of Jesus Christ than in any former age.

Mrs. W. D., Mississippi. 1. Yes, our foodships for supplying the Allies are guarded against attack while crossing the ocean. 2. We cannot undertake to explain the mystery of "table tipping." The Bible warns against having traffic with neeromancers (See Lev. 19 : 31; Isa. 8 : 19).

Troubled Souls, Newark, Texas. Runaway marriages, under any circumstances, are dangerous experiments. Rarely do they turn out well. In the case you mention, much depends upon the marriage laws of the state. Consult a good lawyer. Both the parties may have been under age.

Writing from China, Mr. Philip Ritter gives this interesting note about the old temple of the "Sleeping Buddha" (Wofossu): "It is a beautiful nook, and now it is clothed in all the finery which follows a rainy spring. The old temple is the central building. It is occupied by the Buddhist priests, who put on yellow robes, pound several great bronze bells and sing a five-minute prayer twice a day. This apparently is the extent of their religion. They say that no one ever comes there to worship and they admit that they don't even understand the ancient language of the prayers they sing. Surrounding this temple of the Sleeping Buddha are outbuildings even more beautiful and quaint than the temple itself but instead of beating bells for the edification of a sleeping wooden idol with no worshipers there is character-building being promoted by servants of a living, wide-awake Christ in the interests of some 230 active, earnest students. This is the difference between Buddhism and Christianity. Some mission magazines tell of how Christianity is stimulating Buddhism and the other religions in China to more activity. But you needn't fear for this. Buddha sleeps on, undisturbed by the increasing number of Christians on his own temple grounds. This year about ninety per cent. of the boys attending our conference were already Christian. This is a big advance over other years and shows the results of the recent evangelization efforts. It is hoped to send them from the conference one hundred per cent. Christian."

Cooks and Co-Partnerships

I AM enclosing with this an article clipped from a Woman's Magazine which has vexed me sorely. You see, the writer declares that the mistress of the house is responsible for the "waste and extravagance" which, you told us a while ago, are the "Germans' effective silent allies." She says in so many words that "it is our fault that servants are not economical. That we can teach them not to waste our materials and how to make the best of them. As I am worried to death over my inability or disinclination to do these things, may I ask you how to set about the job?"

—PERPLEXED HOUSEWIFE. (Cincinnati, O.)

Thousands of other conscientious women are tormenting themselves over the same problem. It is so serious at this juncture of our nation's fortunes, and so much depends on the action of the individual housewife, that, with the permission of members of what I long to make a genuine Comfort Corner, I am going to fill our space today with a true story of an experiment made by myself thirty-odd years ago, and which I have kept in practice for most of my housewifely life since then.

My cook at that time was Maggie Daly. She was thirty-five years of age, raw-boned and hard-featured, healthy, industrious, and willing, a good cook and laundress, being assisted in the latter capacity by the chambermaid.

But in every department of labor she had what she would have called "a free hand." One illustration of this brought about the change in household economies of which I shall speak.

I was in the kitchen one morning while she was washing the breakfast china, glass and silver. She did it deftly, as I had taught her to practice the fine art of dishwashing. As she drew the last plate from the steaming suds I caught a glimpse of a cake of soap bobbing in the bottom of the pan, and pointed to it.

"You have left your soap longer in the water than was necessary, Maggie."

Her mop dived for it on the instant and brought it up—half dissolved and shapeless.

"Sure and it's meself what clane forgot to take it out! You see, I souse the things in the hot suds as soon as they are out of the renchin' wather, and it's often I forget to fish out the soap—more's the shame to me!"

I LEFT her looking regretfully at the slippery mass in her hand and betook myself up-stairs where I could formulate a notion that had popped into my brain at sight of the wasted soap. I had thought out my plan before I summoned her that evening to a conference in my sitting-room. Maggie had often talked over ways and means with me in this audience-chamber, but she was evidently startled by the preamble of this talk. I began by reminding her of the "hard winter" through which we were passing, and the increased cost of living. I knew her well enough, I went on to say, to be sure that she would be willing to help me in keeping down expenses, etc. Next, I explained what was meant by a business partnership, and how I wished her to form one with me. As she knew, I was punctilious in paying household bills weekly, demanding that tradespeople should send them in on Monday in order that I might settle them on Tuesday. I kept my household accounts carefully and knew what our expenses were. I purposed to bring these down so far as I could without discomfort to my family. I named the sum I could afford to devote to current expenses. Why not make a "firm" of us two and join our forces in the attempt to save a little here and a little there, and at the end of the week divide the profits?

"For instance," I said, "you can make a cake of soap last half as long again in the laundry and in the kitchen if you will always recollect to take it out of the water as soon as you have a good suds. And by beating eggs longer, and mixing cakes and muffins quickly, you can make two eggs do the work of three. By saving every drop of dripping, and when you have enough, "trying it out," and straining it, you can often use it for frying and shortening, and save lard and butter. All these and dozens of other ways which you can study out will cut down expenses. We will settle everything every week and divide what we have saved. It may be but a few cents sometimes. But whenever we have spent less than what I set aside for the weekly outlay, it will be paid over to us partners—you taking half and I half."

I WISH I could describe the changes that chased one another over the girl's face as the purport of the extraordinary proposal dawned upon her. As I finished, astonishment, incredulity and amusement were merged in the broad smile upturned to me. She was not grasping by nature, and the idea of taking a dishonest advantage of any one—even of an employer—would have shocked her upright soul. But like many others of her class (and as many in higher circles) the thought of being, as she would have put it, "on the make" was honey-sweet to her soul. Before the conference was over, she had suggested several expedients by which the sums now expended might be cut down. I stipulated, firmly, for one thing—our family fare must continue wholesome and palatable and abundant in quantity. There would be no pinching or stinting.

"Thru for you, mem!" she assented—"but I'm thinkin' how there's oftentimes muffins and biscuits and Sally Lunn and the likes left over and standin' around until it's stiff an' stale, and even when it's warmed up, 'tain't anything like so nice as when it's hot. Where's the sense of makin' so many at the first? Specially, when, as happens two or three times a week, I know there's goin' to be one or two of the fambly what won't be at home? An' as you say, there's many bones chucked into the swill-pail what might be cleaned and cracked an' b'iled into soup-stock. Oh, yes! we'll be on the lookout for the scraps an' leaks!"

SHE kept her word during the two years that elapsed between the formation of the co-partnership and her marriage to a worthy fellow who, let us hope, reaped the benefit of our business career.

A winter's housekeeping in Paris and the same in Rome had taught me the true economy of buying food in small quantities, but our winter's supply of coal was laid in already. Maggie took to herself the credit of the discovery that she got as much heat for ovens and boilers when the range was partially filled as when it was packed with coal up to the red-hot plates. A discovery which resulted in the pleasing circumstance that the fuel lasted four weeks longer than the same number of tons had served us within the memory of maid and mistress. Upon which a careful computation of the moneyed gain was made, and the "firm" declared a dividend!

When weekly bills were swollen by company dinners or luncheons, I reckoned the additional cost of the indulgence and made provision therefor. Justice to the other member of the "firm" demanded it. These and other deviations from the running order of business did not interfere with regular profits. Of course, these last varied materially from time to time.

Your magazine monitor is right in the main. Take your stand upon the firm ground that waste is as dishonest as pilfering, and that she to whom is committed the keeping of another's property—be it gold or groceries, silver or soap—is morally responsible for the safety of the same. And be on the lookout for a possible partner in your profession. Should the quest be successful, have it distinctly understood from the beginning, that an equitable share of the profits (id est, the savings) are hers as truly as they are yours.

I throw the subject open for the exchange of opinions on the part of our members. It is one of the burning questions of the day, and if there be any better way of solving it than we have yet hit upon—let us have it!

had been sent overseas and that the goal set for the end of the year, of 1,500,000 men in France, would be reached within the week. This number included all troops sent out of the country, to France, Italy, Archangel or Siberia. On the 15th General March said that the American plans contemplated an army of 4,000,000 men in France which would be big enough to walk through the German lines at will. He said 3,200,000 men would be in France by July, 1919, and 750,000 would be in camp at home, of whom about 2,398,845 would be secured under the proposed change in the draft law.

PRESIDENT TAKES A REST. President and Mrs. Wilson arrived at Manchester, Mass., on August 15, for a few days' rest. The President exchanged visits with Colonel House and received Governor McCall of Massachusetts, but spent most of his time in golf and motoring. The President returned to Washington on August 20.

POSTAL ZONE CONGRESSMAN DEFEATED. Congressman William Gordon of Ohio, a leading advocate in Congress of the Postal Zone iniquity and who in other ways has embarrassed and opposed the Administration, has been defeated for renomination.

AMERICA'S FIRST FIELD ARMY. General Pershing, on August 13, advised the War Department of the formation of the First American Field Army. A field army comprises some 300,000 men. He retained command of this army as well as of the expeditionary forces. While the exact extent of the front held by the American army, which is now on a par as to responsibility with the British and French armies, is not announced, it appears that the Americans now hold the right flank of the long line from the sea to Switzerland, their sector beginning near St. Mihiel and extending nearly or quite to the Swiss frontier. On August 17 American troops carried out a local attack east of St. Dié, taking and holding the village of Frapelle; prisoners were taken. The attack eliminated a German salient which had projected into the American position.

CONSOLIDATING THE DRIVES. It was announced on August 14 that the Y. M. C. A. drive for funds for its work in the camps at home and in France would be consolidated with the campaigns of the Y. W. C. A., the War Camp Community Fund and the American Library Association. The total asked will be $133,500,000, of which $100,000,000 will go to the Y. M. C. A., $15,000,000 to the Y. W. C. A., $15,000,000 to the Community Service and $3,500,000 to the Library Association. The campaign will begin November 11. The Fosdick Committee also announced that the Knights of Columbus, the Jewish Welfare Board, and the Salvation Army would be asked to unite in another campaign in January, 1919. The Knights were reported as opposing this plan as drawing the religious line too closely, and liable to cause criticism and disturbance throughout the country. It was recognized however, that seven separate campaigns could not be arranged without overlapping and confusion and more or less interference with the Liberty Loans.

DRAFT BILL COMPLETED. The Senate Military Affairs committee completed its report on the new draft bill on August 13. The age limits recommended by the Secretary of War, 18 to 45 years, were retained and the exemption provisions were altered to provide that any man given exemption from military duty to engage in necessary war work should become liable to the draft by failure to continue at work. This clause was aimed at strikes in essential industries and was opposed by organized labor. The Senate met on August 15 to consider the bill but failed to secure a quorum on roll call and adjourned to the 19th, when both Houses resumed regular sessions.

THE BIG TAX BILL. The Ways and Means Committee of the House is still wrestling with the problem of how to levy taxes that will produce $8,000,000,000 in a single fiscal year. It was announced on August 12 that the committee had decided to incorporate in the bill the 80 per cent. tax on war profits recommended by Secretary McAdoo, providing that in the case of any corporation either the war profits tax or the excess profit tax should be applied, whichever would yield the greater revenue. Mr. McAdoo was insistent that the war profits tax alone would not reach the profiteers. Figures furnished by the Treasury showed that profiteering had been widespread, especially in foodstuffs, and in shoes and clothing. Clothing and shoe manufacturers had earned from 30 per cent. to 100 per cent. on invested capital, but some of this apparent profiteering was due to liberal prices paid by the government to secure speedy delivery. The committee has decided to recommend taxes of 10 per cent. on all soft drinks sold by the manufacturer or producer and a tax of 1 to 2c on individual soda fountain drinks. A 10 per cent. stamp tax is planned for patent medicines. A federal occupation tax of $10 to be paid by all merchants and professional men and a tax of $25 on wholesale merchants, is incorporated in the bill. It has been practically decided to tax city and state bonds and the committee has considered the advisability of higher tariffs. A plan has also been approved by which unearned incomes will pay a higher income tax than earned incomes, unearned income being defined as "net income derived from dividends on preferred stocks, from interest, rentals, royalties and annuities."

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. Secretary McAdoo, as Federal Administrator of

Railroads, on August 12, issued an order prohibiting the sale of liquor in dining cars, stations or anywhere on railroad property. . . . It is possible that the Federal Railroad Administration will initiate comprehensive plans for the electrification, by the use of water power, of all American railroads. . . . Coal miners are asking for an advance in wages which they claim the operators can pay without increasing prices for coal. . . . Governor Edge of New Jersey, on August 16, issued a proclamation denoting the first Sunday of each month as a "day for service flag prayer." The Governor suggested that on this Sunday Patriotic societies, lodges and the general public be invited to attend the churches for prayer, "for the men in the military service and for the fathers and mothers and others of kin who are grieving for them, who have been left behind in body but who are marching away step by step with them in heart." . . . Five men, a politician, a police lieutenant and five policemen, were found guilty in Philadelphia on August 14, in the famous "Fifth Ward case," for conspiracy to prevent a fair election. . . . The French Transport Djennah was torpedoed in the Mediterranean on July 15, 442 being lost; on the 19th, seventeen were lost and 948 saved from the torpedoed French steamer Australien. . . . Thousands of persons are reported to be dying of starvation in Austria. Turnips, weeds, nettles and even sick dogs are the food of thousands and the workers are becoming too weak to continue at their tasks.

Dr. Gulick Dead

DR. LUTHER HALSEY GULICK, educator and author, of New York, died at his camp in Maine, August 13, at the age of 52. Dr. Gulick was recognized as an authority on physical training in the public schools and author of many articles and books on this subject. He was chairman of the International Committee on Physical Recreation of the War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A. until he had to give up on account of health. He had recently returned from France, where he made a moral survey of the American Expeditionary Forces for the Y. M. C. A.

The Fourth Liberty Loan

THE campaign for the Fourth Liberty Loan, to bear 4 1/4 per cent. interest, begins September 28, and closes October 19. The result of the loan will be watched with keen interest in Europe, not only by our Allies in the war against the Teutonic powers, but by our enemies. It will be regarded by them as a measure of the American people's support of the war. The Germans know full well the tremendous weight and significance of popular support of the war by the people at home backing up the Army in the field. As the loan succeeds, our enemies will sorrow; as it falls short, they will rejoice. Every dollar subscribed will help and encourage the American soldiers, and hurt and depress the enemies of America.

The loan will be a test of the loyalty and willingness of the people of the United States to make sacrifices compared with the willingness of our soldiers to do their part. There must be and will be no failure by the people to measure up to the courage and devotion of our men in Europe. Many of them have given up their lives; shall we at home withhold our money? Shall we spare our dollars, while they spare not their very lives?

The Fourth Liberty Loan will probably be for about $5,000,000,000 and it will be followed in January or February by another campaign for a similar amount, while in May or June the Sixth Loan for another $5,000,000,000 or more will be offered.

of his stores has marked personality. The public is led to believe that John Wanamaker himself may write many of the ads or at least reads them and personally supervises every line. All of the sharp, acrid formality of other store advertising is lacking. And the John Wanamaker stores are notable for the building of homes. Couples will start and end with Wanamaker goods from cellar to garret.

He is quoted as once making the remark that the selling of articles which go to make up home is the most satisfying and ennobling of all the trades. Every housefurnishing establishment is unconsciously, perhaps, creating happiness, moral power, good taste, and comradeship.

For walls have voices, and furniture has companionship. The inanimate soon grows to speak a language of its own. Chairs are comrades and lamps throw more than mere light. The very carpets and rugs on the floors take on something of those who daily tread them. An ancient rug-weaver remarked to a purchaser: "Take the weave of a noble loom. You buy more than texture. You buy the laughter of little children, and the sunshine of Oriental skies and the romance of magic country. I sell you not a rug but Woven Dreams. The price is far too cheap."

The Everlasting End-Thrust

Ruts in a country road after a rain never are straight.

The wheel that follows them is forced into a crooked course; but it's often the only one in which there is any traction.

How hard this is on wheels and wheel bearings you know—if you've ever watched another car approaching on one of those roads and have wondered whether you or the other fellow will have to pull out of the ruts.

The incessant jerking and twisting—first one way, then the other—throws the whole weight of the car sidewise against the wheel bearings.

An extreme case of course—for such roads are avoided—but exactly the same forces pull at your wheels on any country road, and to some extent even on the paved city street.

Here's where the tapered construction of Timken Bearings shows to tremendous advantage. They survive thousands and thousands of miles over the worst roads. The parts of the bearings do not wear out of shape or lose their efficiency. Even the little wear that comes in time to any working part that turns on another can be entirely offset by adjustment. A part turn of the adjusting nut every 5,000 miles or so—and your Timken Bearings are as good as new.

That is why "100,000 miles on Timken Bearings" is not a rare occurrence but a common experience of owners whose cars last long enough to cover such a distance.

The Amazing Experience of Victor Jones

How in One Evening I Discovered the Secret of a Good Memory and in Six Months Increased My Business One Hundred Thousand Dollars.

As I look back on it today I can hardly believe that it is only six short months since I first met David M. Roth, the famous memory expert, and learned from his course—in one evening—how to make my memory do wonderful things, which I never dreamed were possible.

That first meeting, which has meant so much to me since, was at a luncheon of the Rotary Club in New York where Mr. Roth gave one of his remarkable memory demonstrations. I can best describe it by quoting the Seattle Post Intelligencer's account of a similar exhibition:

"Of the 150 members of the Seattle Rotary Club at a luncheon yesterday not one left with the slightest doubt that Mr. Roth could do all claimed for him. Rotarians at the meeting had to pinch themselves to see whether they were awake or not.

"Mr. Roth started his exhibition by asking sixty of those present to introduce themselves by name to him. Then he waved them aside and requested a member at the blackboard to write down names of firms, sentences and mottoes on numbered squares, meanwhile sitting with his back to the writer and only learning the positions by oral report. After this he was asked by different Rotarians to tell what was written down in various specific squares, and gave the entire list without a mistake.

"After finishing with this, Mr. Roth singled out and called by name the sixty men to whom he had been introduced earlier, who in the meantime had changed seats and had mixed with others present."

It was just such a meeting that I attended at the Hotel McAlpin, when Mr. Roth started me on the "Road to Better Memory."

My own progress in memory building since that time seems like one of those pleasant dreams about picking up basketfuls of money. You know the kind—when you lie still and try to stay asleep so you can keep on dreaming (and picking up money). But it is reality all right for I have the proof. I can now go into a room with from 30 to 50 people, and one hour after being introduced to them—or a week after or a month—call their names instantly, almost without a single mistake on meeting them again, wherever it may be or however unexpectedly I may run into them.

But I find I am not the only one who has had this strange and quite unbelievable experience.

Only yesterday I was sitting at the desk of Mr. Roth's publisher, the president of the Independent Corporation, when we were interrupted by the ring of his telephone. I had come to discuss some of the finer points in Mr. Roth's code for linking up numbers with names and business facts. When the Publisher hung up the receiver he said, "That was Terence J. McManus speaking, of the law firm of Olcott, Bonyng, McManus and Ernst. You have heard of him of course—a striking figure in many famous criminal trials in New York City, and a hard man to beat when it comes to a test of wits or memory.

"He says he regards our service in giving this Roth Memory Course to the world as a 'public benefaction.' The wonderful simplicity of the method and the ease with which its principles may be acquired appeal to him tremendously. He says he has already had occasion to test out the effectiveness of the first two lessons in preparing for trial an important action in which he is about to engage. (You see I am pretty good myself at reporting telephone talks—thanks to Mr. Roth!)

"But that is an everyday occurrence now. We have just received this letter from E. B. Craft, Assistant Chief Engineer of the Western Electric Company. He says:

"At one sitting I succeeded in learning the list of 100 words in Mr. Roth's first lesson forward and backward, and to say that I am delighted with the method outlined is putting it very mildly. I feel already that I am more than repaid in the real value and enjoyment I have gotten from the first lesson."

"The gratifying, and inspiring, part of it is," continued the Publisher, "that they all say substantially the same thing. Here is a basket of 1000 letters from Roth enthusiasts received by us in the past 30 days—selected at random from the many thousands who have written in ordering the course. One man says, 'It can't be true!' and returns the course. The other 999 tell in glowing terms what the Roth method is doing for them, in many ways, and how quickly and delightfully they have mastered the big idea.

"A good composite of the general type of these letters is furnished by this letter received several months ago from C. Louis Allen, who at 32 became the President of a million dollar corporation, the Pyrene Manufacturing Company, makers of the famous fire extinguisher. You know the letter but read it again. He says:

"Now that the Roth Memory Course is finished, I want to tell you how much I have enjoyed the study of this most fascinating subject. Usually these courses involve a great deal of drudgery, but this has been nothing but pure pleasure all the way through. I have derived much benefit from taking the course of instructions and feel that I shall continue to strengthen my memory. That is the best part of it. I shall be glad of an opportunity to recommend your work to my friends."

"I tell you, Mr. Jones, it is a great experience to read these letters that pour in every day from every corner of the land—especially when I think how simple this method is and how few people among those who need it so badly have imagined before that such a thing could exist."

* * * *

All this was no surprise to me. In fact it seemed rather "tame" compared to my own experience with the Roth Course—which was as follows:

It sent me ahead in my business like a twin-six "on high" and to a degree that I would not have believed possible. And all in six months!

I know it was the Roth Course that did it. I will take my oath on it. Because I cannot account for the change in my whole business life in any other way.

I had suspected that the letter I saw from "Multigraph" Smith (H. Q. Smith, Manager Multigraph Sales Company of Montreal) was over enthusiastic. But I know now from my own actual experience—that he didn't put it a bit too strong when he wrote:

"Here is the whole thing in a nutshell: Mr. Roth has a most remarkable Memory Course. It is simple, and easy as falling off a log. Yet with one hour a day of practice, anyone—I don't care who he is—can improve his memory 100% in a week and 1,000% in six months."

The cold fact is that my new grip on business came in the six short months from the time I took up the Roth Memory Course.

In that brief period—and my cashier will vouch for this—I increased my sales by $100,000—and that in war time, mind you, with anything-but a

"war bride," and with German drives sending cold shivers down the public spine and submarine knocking holes in business confidence and buying habits.

The reason stands out as brightly as a star bomb. Mr. Roth has given me a firmer mental grasp of business tendencies and a better balanced judgment, a keener foresight and the ability to act swiftly and surely that I never possessed before.

His lessons have taught me to see clearly ahead and how to visualize conditions in more exact perspective; and how to remember the things I need to remember at the instant I need them most in business transactions.

In consequence, I have been able to seize many golden opportunities that before would have slipped by and been out of reach by the time I woke up.

You see the Roth Course has done vastly more for me than teaching me how to remember names and faces and telephone numbers. It has done more than make me a more interesting talker. It has done more than give me confidence on my feet.

It has given me a greater power in all the conduct of my business.

Mr. Roth's course has endowed me with a new business perspective. It has made me a keener observer. It has given me a new sense of proportion and values. It has given me visualization—which after all is the true basis of business success.

Now, dear reader, do you not think you can use this Roth Memory Course in your business? It doesn't cost a penny to try it out. I am willing to lay a large wager—right now—that if you will send for the course and spend one evening on the fascinating first lesson, they won't be able to get it back from you with a team of horses. And you will vote that $5 (which I know you will send eventually) the best investment you ever made.

AMERICA'S GOLDEN HARVEST

By Earle William Gage

Threshing wheat on a big ranch in California

GREAT harvesting machines are grinding out their continuous hum—hum—hum these days. This is the season of the glorious ingathering, for the American farmer is bringing forth the golden grain for the bread and food of our hundred-million population. He will harvest this year nearly 900,000,000 bushels of wheat.

No other country produces such a vast quantity of wheat as does the United States, the annual harvesting representing approximately one-fifth of the world's entire wheat production. Canada has become a great factor in wheat growing within the past decade. With a small population according to acreage, she has grown to be one of the important exporting countries. Forty-five years ago she produced less than 17,000,000 bushels annually. Ten years ago the crop had risen to more than 55,000,000 bushels, and since that date the development of our own fertile Western prairie states is being duplicated in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Early fall is the American harvest season, although somewhere the wheat harvest is always in progress. Down in Texas the rice crop is being harvested. It has been asserted that there are more people living in the world today who are depending on rice than on wheat for subsistence; and that a greater number of the human family live upon millet than upon any other cereal food. Be that as it may, wheat has ever been the preferred food crop of the races of higher civilization. The more progressive nations of the earth have ever been wheat-eaters. Grains of wheat have been discovered in Egyptian tombs of the first dynasty, dating back 4,000 years before the time of Christ. Bread of wheat has been excavated from the ruins of the prehistoric lake dwellings of Vanger and Robenhansen, in Switzerland. The first wheat ever grown in the New World is said to have come from seed accidentally brought with rice from Spain to Mexico and discovered and planted by a negro slave belonging to the ranks of Cortez.

OUR American harvest season, particularly in the South, Southwest and West, has become such a vast problem, that the United States Government has come to the aid of the producers in the matter of financial support. Millions of dollars are placed in the national banks of these regions, that the growers and harvesters may be equipped with ready cash to carry on the energetic task of harvesting the crops. If all our American industries, varied as they are, would be difficult to cite an activity of our annual life that is more far-reaching in its influence than the harvesting of our great grain crops. The average individual fails to apprehend the significance of this until he finds the money market binding closely about him, and is advised by his banker that "the farmers have the cash." The banks need to husband their resources carefully that the great crops may be moved.

The money market and the shortage of transportation facilities have become the modern hindrances of the producer of great crops.

The successful harvesting of our crops has a direct bearing upon every American citizen, whether he appreciates the fact or not. We are all consumers, and the matter of economical harvesting methods bears directly upon the cost of living. With the coming of the more modern systems of production and harvesting, the American farmer is to be congratulated. The practical farmer of today is the man behind a roll-top desk. He is a serious business man; the captain of a vast industry. It is a big task to harvest a bumper crop; a vital matter to feed the crying mouths of 105,000,000 people, to say nothing of Europe. This is the farmer's great task.

The August crop report of the Department of Agriculture estimated the nation's wheat crop at 878,000,000 bushels, a loss of 13,000,000 bushels from July; corn, 2,989,000,000 bushels, a loss of 171,000,000 bushels from July; oats, 1,428,000,000 bushels; barley, 232,000,000 bushels; rye, 76,700,000 bushels; buckwheat, 20,600,000 bushels; white potatoes, 391,000,000 bushels; sweet potatoes, 84,500,000 bushels; rice, 41,600,000 bushels; sugar beets, 6,360,000 tons; apples, 199,000,000 bushels; peaches, 40,900,000 bushels. In the United States as a whole, the production of the chief food crops this year will be large, but less than was expected a month ago. Corn fell off 5 per cent.; the expected harvest of wheat and rye decreased 2 per cent. or 17 million bushels, and potatoes 4 per cent. The barley and rye crops will far exceed all previous records. It should be noted, however, that the big crops of this year are due, not to large yields per acre, but to large increases in the acreage planted, and these increases have been made in spite of a shortage of labor, fertilizer and supplies of all kinds.

With the introduction of improved implements the American farmer has been enabled to compete with the great markets of the world, cultivating his crops and completing the harvest with a far lower cost than in years of old, when scythe and side-swing were in vogue. He plows sixty miles per hour; harrows twenty-five acres where he harrowed nine acres in a day, and harvests his twenty-five acres at a daily cost of less than 50 cents per acre. No matter what other nations may bring forth in the coming years, the enterprise of the American is sure to far outreach them. American inventive skill is the controlling influence in present-day agricultural advancement.

FURTHER, the work done by the American farmer has been greatly simplified though increased by the introduction of modern irrigation methods on the one hand, and dry-farming systems on the other. Dry-farming, a new departure a few years ago, is now receiving the attention of the agricultural world.

Eight hundred thousand acres of desert land under dry-farming methods, yielding a crop of an average of twenty-three bushels to the acre of wheat, oats, barley, are to be harvested this fall. This comes from the lands once regarded as absolutely worthless. In Deming, New Mexico, alone, more than 200,000 acres are now to be harvested, which three years ago were desert-waste places.

The experiments of thousands of scientific farmers have given America the fine, large grain in such increasing quantities each year that it is more than enough to feed our own people. Were all the bushels placed in freight cars, and these cars coupled together, they would fill two mammoth trains—one reaching from Regina, the capital of Saskatchewan, down to New Orleans; the other from New York to San Francisco. There would then be more than 700 cars backed into the sidings.

Big farms have followed in the trail of the mighty reaping machines. The cry of "Westward ho!" has never been so loud as today. Modern civilization has and is answering this cry, and our farmers are watching their acres broaden until they reach "as far as the eye can see." With the careful study of soil and seeds, farming has become less and less of a gamble. Nature has been harnessed to perform her fullest duty.

Out West they are using the combined harvesting machines, capable of taking a swath fourteen feet in width. These great machines are powerful tractor outfits of the self-pulling type, moving across the vast fields under their own power. In one operation the machine cuts, threshes and sacks the grain. It is nothing exceptional for these great machines to turn out 2,000 bushels of threshed grain per day, whereas the common machines used on the smaller farms are worked to the limit in laying low the equivalent of 500 to 600 bushels per day.

IN the vast rolling areas of the "Inland Empire," comprising the grain-growing sections of Washington and Oregon, as well as a portion of Idaho, wheat stands up straight without shattering for several weeks after ripening. This characteristic, which is lacking in the grain-growing States farther east, is probably due to the large amount of available mineral plant food in the volcanic ash soil of the region. The large machines pass through the fields, "heading" the grain; that is, they are set at such a height as to cut off only the head and as little straw as necessary. This lessens the work of the machine by relieving it of the task of carrying through a vast amount of straw. The dry heads pass through the threshing process and the grain is run into sacks on a side platform. Men standing on this platform tie the sacks and place them on the ground, or throw them into wagons alongside the machine. The waste shown in this photograph, lined up at the railway station at Great Lakes, Ill., at 9 o'clock Sunday morning, questions arise as to the meaning of such a gathering. These men have already traveled from 25 to 100 miles, coming from Chicago on the one side and Milwaukee on the other, and from many intervening towns on the Great Lakes. All are volunteers in the army of the Lord. They have come long distances at their own expense to join their service to that of 125 Y. M. C. A. secretaries, in order to conduct 200 Bible classes at as many different points. On Sunday, August 4, that number of classes were taught by these Christian men. The attendance came from many churches. Eleven thousand young men gathered in groups of from 30 to 125 each, to hear what those of maturer years and wider experience had to teach them from God's Holy Word.

WHEN you see more than 100 men, like those

This is not a special occasion, but the regular Sabbath morning program, from 9:15 to 9:45, to be followed by a chaplain's service in other parts of the camps. It is the result of continuous work in planning and organizing under the direction of Mr. Frank Torell, the religious secretary of the camp. On future Sabbaths they expect 15,000 in attendance. The number of teachers increases every week, and plans are on foot to have 1,000 volunteer teachers in training. This surpasses anything yet witnessed in any camp of the Army and Navy. JAS. B. ELY.

A Typical American Camp

THAT there is more than hard work for the recruit in Uncle Sam's Army is best indicated perhaps by figures recently announced by the Y. M. C. A. for Camp Travis, Texas. When it is considered that the soldier is likewise entertained by the Knights of Columbus and by several other organizations the civilian can see that the United States government really appreciates the fact that "all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy" and is doing everything possible to obviate this.

During the month of July alone 44,938 men played in various recreational and athletic games, such as baseball, indoor baseball, volley ball, quoits, wrestling, etc. Athletics have become a part of the soldier's training. Because of this the American soldier is quick to act, quick to think, has speed and stamina. Each and every company has its athletic equipment, and drill is deftly sandwiched in with play; all to the same end—the development of a soldier in every sense the word implies.

That the athletics is of a high standard and perfected by the finest physical directors and instructors in the country is evidenced perhaps in the fact that 95,501 people witnessed various athletic contests during the month. They came not only from San Antonio, but from surrounding towns. At one baseball game there were more than 5,000 people. These contests are arranged by such men as Bud Goodwin, who holds several records at this time as the champion swimmer of the world. The soldier has an opportunity of free instruction in swimming, etc., by these men sent here by the Commission on War Activities.

But athletics are not all the soldier has as a diversion. There are entertainments galore. The finest dramatic talent in San Antonio and its neighborhood entertains the soldiers at the army camp. During the month there was a total attendance of 49,086 at entertainments of various kinds. These range from musical programs to lectures on military subjects, and it would surprise the civilian to know the interest the soldier takes in lectures on military subjects, combined with moving pictures. Some of the lectures have been on thrift, on social and economic questions, on health.

Camp Travis has a splendid library open to the soldiers. Here all the late periodicals, newspapers and war books are available. Every late war book as soon as it comes off the press is sent here immediately. There are 25,000 volumes or more available to the soldiers in the camp through the general library and company and branch libraries, and they are all well patronized. The Y. M. C. A. alone gave away 23,178 volumes during the month of July to soldiers.

There are 159 classes in Bible study in operation at present. Religious meetings numbering 163 were held by the Y. M. C. A. during the month of July and the total attendance was 46,289. The religious activities are not confined to any one faith, for every one has its services at regularly appointed times.

All of this is optional with the soldier. But there is a portion that is compulsory. It is a series of lectures given by the company commanders or health, hygiene, care of the feet, care of equipment "Why we are at War," etc. All of these are intended better to fit the soldier for the part he is to play in the Army. Then there is the regular exercise conducted by the company commanders in which the soldier is required to take part each morning before breakfast and during the day's drill periods. These exercises are to develop and harden the muscles, to develop agility and strong winds, to start the blood in circulation and quicken the brain action.

This is all in the army camp. San Antonio offers numerous other opportunities for pleasure, amusement and improvement, physically and mentally.

straw, after passing through the machine, passes out to the opposite side, and is used to fertilize the ground. It takes from thirty-two to forty horses to haul the horse-drawn machines. One of these machines cuts the grain, threshes, cleans and sacks it in a single operation.

Prizes are offered yearly for the best grain produced. Mr. Wheeler, a farmer living in Saskatchewan, won the $1,000 gold prize for raising the best wheat. James Todd, a grower from Montana, took a $1,000 silver cup for producing the best 100 pounds of wheat. Again, W. H. Dorin, who sent into the exhibition the thirty best ears of Indian corn, won a loving-cup, and so on down the line.

We must tip our hats to the man who made the remark that "He who feeds a hungry individual is good; one who feeds a city is noble; one who feeds a hungry nation is great; but he who provided hunger insurance for all the ages we must consider magnificent." Under Divine blessing, this the American farmer has accomplished.

AT the conclusion of a series of conferences in London between Herbert Hoover and the Food Controllers of Britain, the Dominions, France and Italy, Mr. Hoover gave the following statement: "I am well satisfied with results from the conference of Food Controllers which has been in progress during the last three weeks. These conferences were called at my request with a view to the formulation of policies and programs with regard to the entire import of food supplies to the countries at war with Germany. An agreement has been reached as to policies which will effect a great measure of co-ordination in the purchase and transportation of supplies during the coming year and in their equitable distribution between all the countries, and a program has been agreed upon as to the different commodities that are required not only to maintain the health but the comfort of the armies and civil populations. The people of North America are this year to take upon their shoulders the movement of the great bulk of food supplies required, and it will, therefore, be possible to curtail the total length of voyage necessary to bring these supplies to the European Allies. . . .

By NELLIE BALLOU

A SOUL for a day in a garden flew,
But forgetting the sun and the blossoms and dew,
It was caught by a bramble that downward bent,
And the name that men call it is Discontent,
With bitter berries of jealous hue.
And it marred the soul till it hung forlorn—
Till its iris wings were limp and torn.
Oh, the pity the heart of the Gardener knew
When he found it there in the morn!

United States we have need for continued rigid economy in consumption, so that we may meet the increased demands from Europe and to enable us to carry over, from this more abundant harvest year a stock of foodstuffs that will form positive insurance against any possible climatic eventualities in the next harvest. . . . With the consummation of the war initiated at this conference, there will be a universal war bread of better quality than last year for all those fighting Germany, and this bread practically without rationing. There will be ample supplies of fats and meats if our populations are economical and avoid waste. We will be able to build up some stocks of cereals against the next harvest, and we shall save tonnage over last year by the shorter voyage upon which food ships must be sent. The coal miners of Europe are now at the front, consequently this next winter will be a period of great suffering in Europe through a shortage of coal. If the people can have liberal supplies of bread, meat, and fats, there can be no fear of the morale among the civil population of the European Allies. The promise of this has lifted a load of fear from the minds of the people on this side, particularly in France and Italy. It now remains for our people to make good, and as usual we have the resources to do it."

England's grain crop this year will be the greatest since 1868, the harvest being gathered by soldier prisoners, schoolboys, college students, Boy Scout college women, girls of the land army, Belgian and Serbian refugees, and city clerks on vacation.

What a Stranger Sees in Holy Land

By MAJOR THEODORE WATERS, American Red Cross Commission to Palestine

A FRIEND has written to ask my impressions of Jerusalem and Cairo, and he adds that the latter city made an indelible impression upon him. It produced a similar impression on me too, but not perhaps in the same manner. It was in Cairo that I had my first attack of climatic sickness, so maybe I look at it with biased vision. However, I found on my second visit that there are really two Cairens: one is the Dr. Jekyll, the other the Mr. Hyde manifestation. My first feeling was that it was the wickedest city in the world.

Our first evening there was spent at the American Mission, where services were held. That was very fine and uplifting. But when we came out of the mission and two of us started to take a stroll, what we heard and saw startled us. We walked on and presently we saw soldiers waiting in line at three points, for admittance to places that are better not described. We told about it on our return to Shepherd's Hotel and we were looked upon as unsophisticated. Then we heard of processions, headed by bands of music and earriages containing professional dancing women who thus advertised themselves, which we were told was not an uncommon sight in the streets, but is accepted as a matter of course by the people. There were other things still worse. Naturally, I know that there is as much vice in spots in our own New York as in any other place in the world; but it is not flouted quite so openly on the streets.

On the other hand the Jekyll side of the city is to be found in its wonderful monuments, in the relics of an antiquity that is older than that of almost any other region in the world. There was our visit to the ancient Citadel where the last of the Mamelukes met their fate. The Mamelukes, it seems, were the descendants of the old slave kings of Egypt. They were constantly giving trouble, and one day the reigning Sultan invited all the leading men among them to a grand feast in the Citadel. When they came, the doors were closed and all were massacred except one daring fellow who galloped his horse at the wall, leaped it, and plunged down many feet below, ultimately escaping to tell the tale. Many people believe that it was, in the long run, one of the best things that happened to Egypt.

THEN there was our visit to the Pyramids one Saturday afternoon, under the guidance of the people of the American Mission. We went out in tramcars—an hour's ride—and we saw what I have yearned to see all my life, those great mounds of stone—temples, or rather tombs of dead and gone kings—and the great Sphinx, whose countenance disappointed me not in the least. Many people profess to be disappointed in it. But not I. It was just as serene and majestic and as enigmatical as I had always imagined it. It was evening when we were through drinking in the glory of these monuments. The light was failing and the moon was rising above the edge of the desert. The Mission people had brought a picnic supper. So we climbed up a little bit on one corner of the biggest Pyramid, and had our evening meal with the full moon rising over all, and bringing out in majestic silhouette the other Pyramids in the distance.

However, I said that Cairo made an indelible impression on me. It did, in the form of the four fearful forces of the country—food, fingers, fleas and flies. Through these you may achieve the fullest misery of existence. Food that gives your stomach a turn; fingers that are, in spite of all you can do, carriers of disease; fleas that never let you forget you are only human after all; and flies that are a plague which no one, prince or beggar, escapes. In all my journeyings about here, I have seen but two fly-swatters, and those were carried by soldiers who apparently did not know the custom of the country. People use "fly swishers," little decorative handles, holding a wisp of horsehair, the latter to be used for "shooing" the flies on the next fellow who comes along, thus providing a reincarnation of the horse's tail, which continues after death, as it were, the same duty it performed in life. I think it would be fitting if Egypt should adopt a coat-of-arms composed of a throughout the city, but many of them live in the cave-like interior of the ancient Tower of David, by the Jaffa Gate.

GREEK priests, Roman priests and priests of other sects wend their way through the crowds. Sisters from the various convents hurry along with heads down, and Moslem women, with veils drawn across to hide their faces from the curious gaze of men from every country in Europe, glide silently through the throng. Arabs in varicolored robes gabble away apparently at random, or argue shrilly on street corners over inconsequent matters. Armenians dressed like Europeans, men and women alike, hurry along on urgent business that never seems to be finished. It is really hard to even remember the kinds of people one sees in the course of a short stroll. Soldiers are everywhere, some on horseback, many on foot, dodging the heavily laden camels and donkeys that frequently block the roadway.

And street boys! Real arabs of the street. Running yelling, leaping. Racing to earn some form of backsheesh as every carriage or motor stops and people get out. Upon them all beats the hot sun, and over them all fly the birds—thousands and thousands of swallows, whirling in great circles across and back, until the sun sinks over the hill and it is time for them to retire into their holes in the great wall.

Yes, there is much to see in Jerusalem and to write about, as will be found in future letters.

General Allenby blesses the sacred Scroll of the Law

General Sir E. H. H. Allenby, Commander-in-Chief of the British Forces in the Holy Land, was present at the celebration for the return of the Sacred Parchments, which were written by hand. The scrolls had been guarded by the Jews of Jaffa when they were forced into exile, lest the parchments should fall into the hands of the Turks. This photo shows the Commander-in-Chief responding after receiving the casket containing the Scroll of the Law.

swisher rampant and a flock of flies ardent and underneath the motto: "Honi Swat, the Flies are Fierce!"

ON the other hand, I felt a positive yearning to get back to Jerusalem. For me there is ten times the attraction for the imagination here that one finds in Cairo. Just as a dense wood or the horizon of the sea attracts me because of what may lie on the other side of them, so the City Wall attracts me for the great happenings and the hallowed memories it shelters. Within its circumference occurred the most far-reaching tragedy the world has ever witnessed. Its confines have been the object and the exemplification of the ideals of believers in all the ages—from the First Crusade under Peter the Hermit to our latter-day dispensation—and, for the glory of their various creeds, they maintain their shrines within the very walls of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

I can sit any evening on the balcony of my hotel and watch a procession such as may be seen in no other city in the world. If it is evening, the procession is mostly away from the city toward the hotel. The street itself is covered with dust that reminds one of the alkali of our own Southwestern deserts. It fills the air with its choking whiteness, and everything is covered with it. The big motor lorries, filled with materials for the army, pass and repass, and through the clouds of whiteness they leave behind, struggle pilgrims from all countries who have settled in Jerusalem to pass their days. Jews, hundreds and hundreds of them, all wearing long, thin robes that look like dusters, and round-crowned hats with wide brims, from under which hangs a long corkscrew curl in front of each ear. Even the Jewish boys cultivate an incipient curl at each ear. Mixed in with the Jews, but not of them, are Bedouins from the desert. These are mostly refugees from the neighborhood of Salt, beyond the Jordan. They are quartered in available places

Jerusalem in British Hands

THE New York Times, quoting from letters received from Jerusalem, gives the following interesting description of present condition in the Holy City:

"You will no doubt be delighted to learn that the British have laid water-pipes all the way from Arroub and that next week the water will be in. This dream of a lifetime and of ages' duration is now brought to pass by Britain, while carrying on a war in the country and many other places.

"Yesterday the first broad-gauge train came into the city from Cairo.

"Meanwhile many other improvements have taken place. The roads are being repaired and new roads built all the time. About 10,000 people, men and women, girls and boys, are earning a much better wage than they ever did before, working on the road. Plans are being made for the improvement and growth of the city; the reforestation of the country is being studied; the health of the city is being carefully looked after; the sewerage of the outside is being taken into consideration. Meanwhile the authorities have had the onerous burden of rationing the city and the inhabitants.

"It will not astonish you to learn that for three and one-half years we have not had sugar, but for two years we have had grapefruit boiled down, that answered for preserves, and a molasses extracted from the carab pod (St. John's bread) which could be used for sweetening in cake.

"For the duration of the war we did not have rice; now it is easily obtained. You have wheatless days—we had all-wheat years, being compelled to have this kind of substitute for rice.

"Vegetables are impossible to find through lack of transportation facilities. We are coming to coalless days, for now the cutting down of trees is being prohibited. Yesterday I visited a miserly person, and he said they had not had meat for two years."

Senate Sub-Committee Clears Airplane Situation

THE charges and countercharges, the accusations and the statements in defense, which created a situation in the aircraft industry, requiring both a legislative and judicial investigation, were all more or less confirmed by the report of the sub-committee of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, made public on August 22. The committee first outlined our history in the field of aviation since the declaration of war on April 6, 1917. On June 8, 1917, public announcement was made that a great fleet of 25,000 airplanes was about to be created. On July 24, 1917, Congress appropriated $640,000,000 to put these planes in flight and later added $884,304,758. "The first appropriation was practically wasted," the report says, and continues: "While much good work has been accomplished, for which due credit should be given, it must be admitted that our airplane program has up to the present presented many aspects of failure."

Some of these were mentioned in detail as follows:

Six hundred and one De Haviland-Four bombers were shipped to France up to August 1, 1918. Of these 67 had reached the front by July 1. On August 7 the first squadron, 18 planes, flew over the German lines. These De Havilands as shipped were imperfect and dangerous and men had to be sent over to correct defects before they could be used.

We not only have no fighting or heavy bombing planes of American manufacture at the front, but we have not yet reached quantity production on these important types.

Attempts to create a fighting plane around the Liberty motor resulted in the fruitless expenditure of over $6,500,000 on the Bristol type, to the loss of money being added the loss of four gallant men. Similar experiments with the Hall-Scott engine in a Standard J training machine cost $6,000,000 and left 1200 condemned machines in storage.

Contracts for the French Spad single seater fighting plane were several times given and withdrawn and after a year's loss of time we are only now entering quantity production of an English adaptation. Meanwhile of 1000 ordered from France only 418 have been delivered because of the imperative needs of the French service. We have received from British and French sources and put into service 2,114 machines.

An arrangement with France for the construction of machines from American materials attained no result through failure to deliver the materials.

The committee declared that the disappointing results were due chiefly to the following causes:

1. That the airplane program was largely placed in the control of the great automobile and other manufacturers who were ignorant of its practical problems.
2. These manufacturers undertook the impossible task of creating a motor which could be adapted to all classes of flying craft.
3. We failed at the beginning of the war to adopt the common sense course of reproducing the most approved types of European machines in as great numbers as possible. . . . This sound policy has very recently, but after lamentable lapse of time, been adopted.

The committee made the following recommendations:

- First—The creation of a Department of the Air under a cabinet officer making the air service, as in England and France, a military unit in the same sense as the army and navy.
- Second—A commission of engineers and pilots kept at the front in relays to keep betterments and improvements in line with the rapidly developing situation.
- Third—The acceleration of quantity production by using every concern which can be engaged at its full capacity.

Fourth—Greater attention to the development and perfection of the airplane as a commercial and industrial necessity.

Fifth—Wide encouragement of inventors.

Sixth—Ample protection of patents.

Seventh—Reduction of the margins of profit.

Eighth—Revision of contracts to put burden of defective planes upon producers where defects arise through deviation from official specifications.

The committee criticized severely the centering of the airplane effort about Dayton, Ohio, and Detroit, Mich. It praised the work already accomplished by General Kenly and Mr. Ryan in untangling the knots left by the Aircraft Board and getting quantity production under way, but made no suggestions as to possible moral discrepancies leaving that side of the question to Justice Hughes.

A Week in the World's News

FOR THE GREATER ARMY. The Administration Man Power Bill providing for the drafting of men from 18 to 45 years of age was being pushed in both Houses of Congress on August 21. The House Military Affairs Committee reported the bill favorably, but with an amendment providing that youths of 18 should be called last for service, and that 19-year-old registrants should not be called until the men of 20 to 45 had been taken. This amendment opposed in committee was lost on the floor of the House. Pending the passage of the bill, the Provost Marshal General was preparing for the great registration which it was hoped to hold September 5; 16 envelope manufacturers were said to be printing a total of 35,000,000 envelopes, and 58,000 steel filing cases were ordered to hold the questionnaires of the registrants, of which it was estimated there would be 13,000,000.

The bill was passed by the House on August 24 by 336 votes to 2.

TRAWLER TURNS RAIDER. The American steam trawler "Triumph" captured by a U-boat operating on the Grand Banks on August 20, was armed with two light guns, equipped with a plentiful supply of shells and bombs, manned by a crew of 16 men, and sent out to prey on the fishing fleet. On the following day the trawler sunk 5 fishing schooners, two Canadian and 3 American. It was thought that she had secured several other victims. Naval vessels at once began to scour the waters for the new enemy.

On August 20, an American steamer which made an Atlantic port with a badly broken nose, reported ramming a submarine on August 17 off the Virginian coast. The submarine was turned broadside on to the steamer. The extent of the damage to the submarine was not known, but judging by the damage to the steamer it was thought probable that she had been sunk.

Two Norwegian ships, the steamer "San Jose" and the bark "Nordhav" were sunk by submarines off the Virginian Capes on August 17. The American steamer "Montana" was torpedoed and sunk in foreign waters on August 16. She was in government service. A British freighter was unsuccessfully attacked off Nantucket on August 21.

SPAIN WARNS BERLIN. The Spanish merchant marine, having suffered to the extent of 20 per cent. by the illegal operations of German submarines continued in spite of Spanish protests, the Spanish government early in August sent an ultimatum to Germany, in which the Kaiser's government was informed that for each Spanish ship sunk from that date a German ship interned in Spanish ports would be seized. Nearly 90 ships of the German merchant marine are tied up in Spanish harbors. Berlin has threatened to break relations with Spain if Spain persists in this "unneutral" plan.

LLOYD GEORGE SAYS WOMEN SAVED ALLIES. In a letter to the Inter-Allied Woman's Congress, meeting in Paris on August 21, Premier Lloyd George said:

I am anxious to bear testimony to the tremendous part played by the women of England in this vital epoch in woman's history. Had it not been for the splendid manner in which the women came forward, working in the hospitals, ammunition factories and in administrative offices of all kinds and in war work behind the lines, often in daily danger of their lives, Great Britain, and I believe all the Allies, would have been unable to withstand the enemy attacks of the last few months. For this service to our common cause humanity owes them unbounding gratitude."

AIR PLANES FROM AMERICA ON DUTY. Following the announcement that a complete squadron of Handley-Page bombing planes, made in America, had been shipped to France, and placed in the service, it was reported, on August 21, that American aviators and American machines had made a successful bombing trip over the German lines. The fact that American-made planes were actually flying was said to give new spirit to every man in the ranks.

SWEDEN RECOGNIZES ALLIED SUPREMACY. It was announced, on August 22, that through the concurrence of the United States in agreements already concluded between Sweden and Great Britain and France, Sweden would loan to the Allies 400,000 tons of shipping and would sell to the Allies iron ore and paper stock, hitherto largely shipped to Germany, while the Allies would ration Sweden.

SENATOR LODGE STATES AMERICA'S TERMS. Addressing the Senate on the eve of his election as Republican floor leader, Senator Lodge of Massachusetts, in an eloquent speech warned against the harboring in America of German insidious and poisonous peace propaganda such as wrecked the Russian army and led to Italy's reverse last fall. He said that in order to meet such propaganda it was necessary to have the items of a great and righteous peace clearly expressed so that the world would know exactly what we mean. He said also that such a peace could only be assured by victories won inside the German frontiers. The Senator outlined, as follows, the terms he thought a just minimum:

- Belgium must be restored.
- Alsace and Lorraine must be returned to France unconditionally.
- All areas where the Italian race predominates, including Trieste, must go to Italy.
- Serbia and Roumania must be established in their independence.
- Greece must be made safe.
- The Yugoslavs and Czecho-Slavs must be established as independent states.
- The Polish people must have an independent Poland.
- These independent states must be created to bar Germany's pathway to the east.
- The provinces taken from Russia by the villainous peace of Brest-Litovsk must be restored.
- Constantinople must be taken from Turkey and the Dardanelles opened for mankind.
- Palestine must never be returned to the Turk, and the persecuted Christians in Asia Minor must be made safe.

On the same day Lord Robert Cecil, under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the British Cabinet, declared in London in answer to a plea from Dr. Solf, German Colonial Minister, for the return of Germany's colonies, that Germany's brutality and callousness in the government of her colonies made it impossible for the world ever to restore them to her.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. American forces in Siberia were reported, on August 17, to have relieved Czecho-Slovaks guarding the Siberian railroad, releasing them for action against the Bolsheviks on the Ussuri front. The Allied troops were reported on August 22 as withdrawing on this front under pressure of superior numbers. Chinese troops have also appeared on the Manchurian frontier. . . . In the Nebraska Republican primaries Senator Norris of Nebraska was renominated. In Mississippi Senator Vardaman was defeated for renomination. . . . The government administration of the telephone and telegraph lines of the country will result in the combining of all competing systems wherever such action is found feasible. The Bell Telephone organization, comprising about 50,000,000 miles of wire, will probably be put in direct connection with independent systems operating 25,000 000 miles of wire which have formerly been in more or less competition with the larger systems. . . . Lake Michigan and the Gulf of Mexico were connected on August 22 by the opening of the old Illinois and Michigan Canal. A barge line towed by motor boats will operate between Chicago and St. Louis.

Watch the Girl from Orchard Street

PRESUMPTUOUS self-esteem based on prosperity often leads to misjudgments. In many a small town it is a social crime, not to be condoned, for wealth to notice those who live among poverty. Orchard Street was the home of poverty. Mary Ellis's father wasn't poor, but he did drink too much sometimes, and they lived on Orchard Street. But Mary Ellis, once a tomboy, had seen a vision and she followed it in spite of scorn and averted faces and staring eyes. She made her place in the world by loving service and she—but why

Still Sweeping Back the Huns

The Allies Continue to Hammer the Way to Victory Along the Whole Battle-Front in France

EVERYTHING is going well. We have begun our action and shall continue," said Marshal Foch to the war correspondents on August 23. Pressed for a statement about what might be in store, he answered, "Realities are far better than any sort of promise. . . . Nothing but realities count."

And the realities were sufficient for the day, for in a battle line of over fifty miles, from Arras all the way around to Soissons, the German armies were being outfought, out-generaled and driven back. Some correspondents called it the greatest battle in history. In the five weeks since July 18 the Kaiser's armies had lost nearly half of all their gains in five offensives covering four months, had lost over 100,000 men taken prisoners, and had left behind them more than 2,000 guns, from field pieces up to an 11-inch monster mounted on a railway truck, which they had prepared for the bombardment of Amiens, but which, on August 23, was being exhibited to the people of Paris. Their losses in machine guns, trench mortars, ammunition and equipment of all sorts were so great that they had not yet been counted at this writing.

But the most serious German loss is in morale, that intangible force which makes victors of dog-weary men.

Started on their march to victory and peace on March 21, the German army, until July 18, believed its leaders capable of forcing their will upon the enemy. In five weeks of constant defeat the German faith in victory has vanished, the prisoners admitted that Germany could not win, and daily the correspondents reported more surrenders, more prisoners who agreed that, with America in the fight, Germany must lose, unless she could force a "peace by negotiation."

This old phrase, a favorite with German statesmen during the last four years whenever defeat threatened, has dropped up again. But it died to Entente ears at Brest-Litovsk.

On Sunday, August 18, his forces apparently held along the line from Chaumes to Lassigny and Noyon, Marshal Foch struck northward, between the Oise and the Aisne. This attack was noted last week. Although meeting resistance, the thrust penetrated well into the German positions. The Germans claimed to have halted it before their battle positions. On the following day another thrust developed "battle positions" further back, and each day saw the enemy losing valuable ground. On Tuesday, August 20, General Mangin's fourth army drove forward again on this fifteen-mile front, gaining two and a half miles and overrunning the highways from Soissons to Noyon. On the same day the British discovered the Germans falling back west of Merville, in the Flanders salient.

General Mangin's progress east of the Oise forced the Germans back in the difficult country west of the river, their retirement eventually reaching the little Divette River and uncovering Lassigny, which General Humbert's army took, on August 21. On this day Mangin also swept further forward, taking 8,000 prisoners, many guns and flanking the Germans out of Carlepont forest, forcing them to retire across the Oise along a constantly widening front southeast of Noyon.

WHILE Mangin and Humbert were keeping Fritz occupied thus in the south, General Byng, of Cambrai fame, on Wednesday, August 21, after a short "crash" bombardment, launched another of his tank attacks at the Germans along the line south of Arras nearly to Albert. The attack was launched under cover of a dense fog and made immediate headway, the English gaining about two miles and reaching the line of the Arras-Albert railway along most of the front of attack. This line, the embankments and cuts offering good defense, was strongly held by the Huns, and the British and Germans fought it out through two days of obstinate struggle, in which towns and farms changed hands many times and English troops were often driven back, but not to stay. Always they came on again and at last the Germans had to accept defeat. The Allies crept forward until the important base of Bapaume, the northern key to the battle line, as Noyon was the southern, was under serious threat from both north and west.

But Foch still had a few hammers left,

drawal from the now outflanked positions along the Vesle and the Aisne.

Friday, August 23, saw Byng's men going forward again, but against furious resistance, the Germans evidently being determined to save Bapaume at any cost. Here the Huns lost great numbers of men killed and as prisoners, and the British bag of guns, big and little, increased as they forced their way through positions heavily organized for desperate defense. The British field-guns raced forward, taking position on the run, behind the advancing army, while the tanks in great numbers were everywhere and doing deadly work. This day also marked great advances on the south, General Humbert crossing the Divette south of Noyon, while Mangin crossed the Oise east of Noyon, and swept up the Ailette to positions before the heights of Juvigny, northeast of Soissons. Noyon was thus threatened from the southwest, southeast and northeast. On the Vesle the Germans launched a series of violent attacks against the positions east and west of Fismes, north of the river, held by the Americans and French. The attacks were completely broken up, the Allied positions, except one or two outposts, being entirely restored. One American battalion west of Fismes, though outnumbered three to one, repulsed all the

to Albert. Pozieres, east of Thiepval, was taken and the highroad from Albert to Bapaume was crossed along its entire length. The fortified positions at Saignies and Behagnies guarding Bapaume were also taken and British patrols entered Bapaume before sunset. North of Bapaume, Croisilles and St. Leger were left behind and Bullecourt—less than half a mile from the Hindenburg line—was captured, while Mory, to the southwest along the road from Bullecourt to Bapaume, became the center of desperate fighting. The Germans were defending themselves in shell craters left by the fighting of two years ago. British cavalry, tanks and armored cars were out in front of the infantry, and the battle was everywhere in the open, with the Germans throwing in fresh troops to hold back the British, while they disengaged themselves and their equipment.

The rapidity of the British advance south of Arras is shown by the capture of a brigade commander in his headquarters just as he took up his telephone to call for artillery support. At that moment a British Tommy put his head in the window and told the General he was a prisoner. A little later on this commander stood at the gate of the prisoner's cage and with a smile and a handshake, greeted his officers as they arrived.

Five days of furious fighting yielded the British more than 17,000 prisoners and many guns, while the week's fighting in the south netted the French 13,000 prisoners and over 300 guns. August 25 saw no appreciable advance by either Mangin's or Humbert's forces.

THE morning of August 26 saw the whole German line, from Arras around to Rheims, in retreat. Some correspondents thought that Foch had learned of, or had surmised a German intention to retreat and had hit hard, not to break through, but to prevent an orderly retreat and to make the retrograde movement as costly as possible to the enemy. Whether Marshal Foch knew or did not know the German intentions, he knew his own plans and these have developed rapidly into what has begun to approach a first-class success. He has not only held the initiative, but he has forced the fighting into the enemy's territory and shaken the enemies' hold, both on the terrain he had overrun and on the confidence of the people back home. In Berlin on August 25, the people of the poorer sections, maddened by the announcement of further drafts on old men for war service, tore down from the walls of homes and cafés gaudy posters of the Kaiser, von Hindenburg, von Ludendorff and the Crown Prince, threw them into the streets and trampled them to shreds. There were some arrests. The German correspondents, in their dispatches, have been kept busy making defeat wear habiliments of victory and the official reports have chronicled every repulse of an Allied attack, omitting German reverses, and where retreat described in detail could not be denied, they have given it the color of a voluntary move in accord with "the plan of the high command."

American machine-gunners in a village in France whose guns trained on the opposite shore of a river are keeping Fritz interested and on August 22 he swung one of them—the British armies of General Rawlinson—against the Germans south of Albert, from the Ancre to the Somme. Here again the initial penetration was about two miles on a six-mile front, the gains pocketing the Germans in Albert. Albert was taken by storm that night while the Germans were preparing to withdraw, and Haig's men swung eastward over a mile to the heights east of Albert where the Germans attempted a stand. While Byng and Rawlinson were swinging against the German right north of the Somme, Humbert and Mangin continued to hammer his left.

Between the Oise and the Aisne the German retirement began to assume the aspect of a rout. General Mangin on the night of August 22 advanced over seven miles in places. His men swept up the east bank of the Oise, clear to its confluence with the Ailette and forced their way eastward toward the heights guarding the German lines of with-attacks of three German battalions. This attack was believed to mask a German retirement toward the Aisne, General Mangin's advances having made the Vesle positions almost untenable.

On Saturday, August 24, the nature of this attack became apparent as the American troops west of Fismes advanced northward to the Soissons-Rheims highway, and fires were observed back of the German lines, while the artillery fire weakened noticeably. South of Arras, all the way to the Somme, the British also advanced, reaching Croisilles and St. Leger, north of Bapaume, taking by storm the strong ridge back of Thiepval (which saw such sanguinary fighting in 1916) and pushing on north of the Somme well past Bray.

IN the face of constantly more bitter resistance, the British forces continued to press the Germans back on August 25 from Croisilles all the way south

Christian Unity

CHRISTIAN love is drawing the churches together. More than at any time in the past, the desire for spiritual co-operation is manifesting itself. The heaven is working here and abroad. In Great Britain, the committee appointed by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Free Church Commissions, and other bodies are looking forward to the proposed World Conference on Faith and Order, with the expectation that it may accomplish great results. Similar influences are at work here, which justify the hope that in the near future material progress will be made in unifying the churches, and eliminating the causes that have kept them apart. It is a huge task, as Rev. F. B. Meyer and other leaders in the movement have pointed out, to bring the various branches of Protestantism together on common ground, to reduce the causes of rivalry which have kept them divided and even antagonistic, to promote co-operation in Christian work, to energize spiritual life in the churches and to achieve a common organic basis which will retain all of the essentials of the Christian faith. Yet it is a work that should be done and which, soon or late, will be done. The prayer of our Lord "that they may all be one—that the world may believe that thou didst send me" will not always remain unanswered.

Our churches, their pastors and people need to pray to be filled with the spirit of unity and to work zealously and confidently for it. Then unity will come, and there shall be one flock, one Shepherd, throughout all Christendom.

Profiteering in Food

DETAILED information on the extent of war profiteering has been given to Congress recently in compliance with a resolution requesting it, and the Federal Trade Commission is understood to have obtained considerable information from the income reports.

According to a Treasury analysis of income tax returns, war profiteers in 1917 were most numerous in lines of business devoted to food production and distribution, cotton and woolen manufacturing and dealing, coal mining, iron, copper, aluminum and other metal production, and oil production and distribution. In addition, thousands of small concerns in a great variety of industrial and commercial classifications made profits ranging from 100 to 3,000 per cent. above their normal profits for pre-war years, which even then were considered high.

In citing certain industry or commerce classifications as containing the largest percentage of profiteers, the Treasury has made it clear that not all individual businesses in these groups have gathered in swollen earnings. This is true particularly of coal operators, some of whom made enormous profits, often several hundred per cent. higher than good earnings of former years, while others made barely enough to pay justified dividends.

The disclosures formed the basis of a hard fight to put through the Senate the 80 per cent. war profit tax asked by the Secretary of the Treasury. Senator Borah, a leading advocate of the high tax, pointed out that one of the striking features of these reports is that the very largest profits are made by those dealing in foodstuffs, and another striking feature is that these foodstuffs are generally under control of the Food Administration.

"I expect," he said, "to see the Food Administration adopt a wholly different policy than what it has followed in the past, in view of these revelations."

The Lesson in Thrift

THE War Savings campaign has in the few months of its duration made a long stride toward educating the American public to the war necessity of thrift, of lessening the normal consumption of the things the government needs to prosecute the war, and it has offered to millions of patriotic Americans a means and an opportunity for translating their savings into aid to the fighting men in France.

Supplementing the thrift movement, though not directly a part of it, is the immense decline in the importation of luxuries. According to a compilation made from official figures, the value of art works imported in 1918 is about $11,000,000, against $23,000,000 in 1917 and $35,000,000 in 1914. In automobiles the value in 1918 was about $50,000, against nearly $2,000,000 in 1913 and more than $2,000,000 in 1912, while the average value per machine imported in 1918 was less than one-half that before the war.

Decorated china-ware imported in 1918 was about $3,500,000 in value, against $8,000,000 in 1914. Almost the same ratio was shown in decreases of precious stone and jewel imports.

The American people, rich and poor, are learning to do without the non-essentials. Once the most wasteful of people, they are learning that self-denial and simple living which is necessary to support the government is equally beneficial to themselves.

Smile and Be Cheerful

IN a little play written for our young soldiers at one of the great national camps, a famous lyrical composer—who is in the ranks training with the rest for service at the front—has a little song which he sings, the refrain of which tells how he "washes the dishes, against his wishes, to make the world safe for democracy." And the spirit of the song carries away the audience. It admonishes them to do not their "bit" but their "best" bravely, no matter what sacrifice of dignity nor what effort of strength it may involve, and to smile and keep smiling.

True, the philosophy of cheerfulness does not always seem an easy one to follow. These past years we have had, perhaps, too little of the shine and a good deal of the shadow; yet hardly a day so gloomy but it has had its bright relieving beams. And now the sun is tipping the horizon's edge, drinking up the mists, sweeping away the shadows, and encouraging us to our appointed work. Be that work heavy or light, let us accept it in the spirit of cheerfulness. When one sees preachers working as day-laborers, men accustomed to big business helping in unusual tasks, women of delicate training scrubbing and cleaning and nursing and mending, and thousands of others throwing ease and dignity aside that they may lend a hand where most needed, then one begins to learn that fine clothes and social position and all the rest of the toggerly of wealth and ease to which we ordinarily attach so much importance count for very little in a time like this. If we are loyal and willing we will toss all impedimenta aside and pitch in to the task before us with a smile, remembering our duty well done is our part of the great national service.

Our boys at the front go singing into the fight. Like young Galahads, "their strength is as the strength of ten," because they fight for righteousness and justice. The sun shines more brightly on the hills and fields and valleys of France since they came. Victory is in the air. So may we, under the same inspiration, put new vigor into our work, new feeling into our sacrifices, new love into all we do for their sakes. They are worth it all and much more. And when they come back to us, riper, manlier, nobler from their great experience, may we know from the smiles that shine through the tears that they feel that we, too, have done our best to help bring about the result we all desire.

A Bold Arraignment of Austria

OUTSPOKEN criticism of the Austrian Government and its policies is making itself felt increasingly, even in the face of sharp discouragement. During the recent debate on the Czech motion for the impeachment of Premier Seidler and Minister of the Interior Count Toggenburg, Deputy Stransky, a Czech member, electrified the Vienna Parliament by a speech of amazing boldness in which he voiced the sentiments of a large proportion of the Austrian people in striking language. We quote a portion of his address from the Bohemian Review:

We are determined to show to the foreign nations how unbearable has become the German domination over the peoples of Austria and what violence is being committed in Austria under the guise of decrees, illegal in every respect. We bring a charge against this premier that he is a typical representative of the Prussianized Austria whose very existence means a prolongation of war and constitutes one of the greatest obstacles preventing a conclusion of peace by the liberation of the smaller, hitherto oppressed nations.

In place of conciliating the various nationalities and races, Seidler adopts German policies and attempts to crown fifty years of German terrorism by forging slave fetters on these nationalities and binding them to the wheels of the revengeful German Moloch. The Germans undoubtedly begin to see that their domination is nearing the end and so they attempt to legalize the robberies they committed by the establishment of a German province in Bohemia; the partition of this country is their first step for this end. Austria will exist only so long as its people desire it. We now declare that with God's help we hope some day to smash it. Austria embodies century-old crimes against the liberty of mankind. The highest national duty of the Czech people is to harm Austria wherever and whenever it is possible. This we owe to the Czech people and to our loyalty to the Bohemian crown, which loyalty can only be put in practice by opposing and even betraying Seidler's Austria.

So we are determined to be prepared with all means within our power.

Austria is not a state, but a nightmare centuries old, an Alp mountain of tyranny and nothing else. Austria is a state without patriots and without patriotism; it is an absurdity; it is such a state that Czech soldiers sent against the enemy embrace him and join him for the formation of new regiments and divisions against Austria.

"At this point," adds the Review, "policemen appeared and cleared the galleries, so that outsiders might not hear such treasonable talk and took possession of the records with a view to striking out the objectionable sentences."

Stransky's speech reveals the tremendous undercurrent which threatens the disruption of "the mountain of tyranny" that has so long oppressed the freedom-loving races under Hapsburg rule. When currents flow so furiously, wrecks may be expected.

Personal—To You

AMONG the many burdens which publishers have had to bear during the past months have been the tremendous increase in the cost of paper, the cost of printing, the cost of engraving and the cost of clerical help. There will undoubtedly be other increases. As our readers doubtless know, the zone rate of postage, under which publishers are obliged to pay the greatly increased amount of postage to mail their periodicals to subscribers in the Parcel Post Zones, went into effect July 1. This alone will necessarily cause an increase in price in the near future of a great many periodicals. The increased postage in many instances is more than the entire profit of the publisher, so the subscriber is asked to bear a share of the burden by paying an increased subscription price.

For some time past the United States Government has been studying the subject of paper consumption by publishers, and as a measure of economy will undoubtedly order publishers to cut off all copies to subscribers at the end of the time paid for. They will order the discontinuance of free and exchange copies and of all subscriptions not paid for in advance by cash. They will order the discontinuance of sample copies. Publishers will be instructed to make no combinations of magazines at less than 75 per cent. of the regular subscription price. In some cases publishers will be compelled to reduce the weight of the paper used. The government has already compelled the publishers of daily papers not to give credit for unsold copies which are returned, and probably in the near future will make a similar order to apply to weekly and monthly magazines. The shortage of paper in this country is a very serious problem.

Many magazines have increased their subscription prices during the past two months. Many others will doubtless increase their subscription rate of October 1st. The Christian Herald wishes to avoid a similar policy, and with the prompt co-operation of a lot of its readers now, it hopes that it may not be necessary to raise the subscription price.

This end can be accomplished if every subscriber who reads this notice sends us his or her renewal of subscription without delay. We must depend upon the whole Christian Herald Family to do this in their own interest as well as in ours. Hence we ask all to help us, and the way to help us is to send in your renewal during the present month—before October 1st.

The New Hope in Palestine

FEW events in the course of the war have made a deeper impression upon the public mind than the pledge given to restore Palestine to the Jewish nation and establish the ancient land as a national Jewish home. But it now appears that the program includes much more. It carries with it the restoration of those nations and lands over which the infidel Moslem power has ruled rough-shod for many centuries—the Jews, the Arabians and the Armenians. With the progress of the war men's views have broadened of the value of nationality, and the right of the ancient races, equally with the modern, not only to exist but to govern themselves, and their right also to be aided by all civilized peoples in working out their own destiny.

The eyes of the world are centered, however, upon Palestine, where the dawn of a new freedom has risen. Palestine's agricultural colonies, its industries, its sanitation, its water supply, its transportation problem, its reforestation, will be among the constructive tasks of the immediate future. To its development the wealth and influence of the nations will be tributary in the great hope of a rejuvenated Israel.

They, sore vexed, doe yrunne toward ye Jongleur, to thruste hym from ye place of worshyppe by force majeure, deeming he had their Lady insulted.]

WITH laggard steps, with rumbling tongue, Big Bill Ledyerd paced wearily northward, hour by shivering hour. Moved on by policemen, narrowly missed by motors and surface cars at crossings, trudging, sitting on park benches in the early sunshine that was as cold as that charity that begins at home and stays there; failing to answer the gibes of the newsboys, somehow erect enough to escape the suspicion of intoxication, with fever mounting, chest aching, cough racking, lungs tightening, he made slower and slower progress. At some time in the afternoon he helped a brewery truck driver close down a hatchway and was asked to ride. His brain was hazy after that. But he was dumped at the edge of the evening in front of a great white, tent-like structure, across from which was a trim brick building.

In a moment of half-lucidity the King of the Shillibers asked a passer-by: "What's this?" waving his hand toward both buildings.

"Why, that's Riverside Hospital, and the other is Billy Dundee's White Tabernacle," was the reply.

Big Bill stood there and as he did so the pain in his chest increased, the cough came again, and the fever mounted higher. First he shivered, then he felt hot flashes through his being.

The answer of the passer-by had meant nothing to him. Before his fevered recollection was passing a scene of other days. He was before a big tent. It was dark, the summer's dark. The gasoline torches were flaring before the concession-owners' stands. Ballyho men were barking. The reek of torch gas was in the air. He was in a crowd before a sideshow. His ballyho man was La Rue, his friend. La Rue was just finishing his talk.

A CLUSTER of electrics, in the angle of the tabernacle wall near at hand where Dundee's lithograph was, blazed up, snapped on inside by some one. Dully Ledyerd, his eye caught by this new brightness, gazed.

Oh, yes. La Rue had finished his talk. There he was, before him, his arm up in the signal for Big Bill to shill the crowds.

"Move on, quit blockin' th' sidewalk!" came in his ear.

Wearily Big Bill fell into step with the crowd. That it took him inside he hardly sensed. Oddly the pressure of the lighter throngs of the early hour called to olden memories. He grasped dimly at the tail-end of the puzzle of his whereabouts at times—only to lose it.

"Th' sideshow's over and I'm goin' into th' big tent t' be ready t' shill 'em off th' top seats fer th' concert," he mumbled to himself, leaning sloppily forward, slouching unevenly.

He sniffed in the odor of the crushed sawdust. The canvassmen had bedded the rings down well, he thought. Best so, then the horses wouldn't slip. He caught with bleared eyes part of the view of the circular arena-like tabernacle's interior. Yes, somewhere off down there was the ring, and from behind that bunting-bedecked place at the back presently a herald would come to blare forth swelling notes on a trumpet, and then the great spectacle that made the show's opening appeal for plaudits would be in progress, setting forth to the crowd all the splendors of Cleopatra's court. But as for him, he would sit there on the top tier of seats to rest. He was tired, after shilling all those people into the sideshow. He would take it easy until it was time to shill for the concert.

BESIDE him as he sat there on the hard board seat was a girl, who leaned against a fellow. Well, he had seen many a girl lean that way against a fellow on the top seats before the big crowd came in to fill the tent. Honeymooners or near-honeymooners liked to be off by themselves. He would keep watch of them, for use, later. Otherwise they were not interesting to look at. He viewed, instead, the steadily oncoming crowds, surging in from the entrance he had used, and the others, trudging along, filling up the body of the place. The lights were all on now. It was the first electric-lighted show he ever had seen, but then, maybe, it was a new wrinkle to catch the public. As for him, he was comfortable now, warm, even hot. And tired. Big Bill leaned forward; his nodding head jerked, came erect. He glanced slyly around. No one had said "Move on, there—"

"Mona," the young man of the King's honeymoon couple was saying, "does the old snoozer there bother ya' any? He looks like a rummi t' me. Want him put out?"

"Let him alone, Jim," she said, compassionate on account of her own thronging woes, and because she was so by nature. "Let him be."

Those rear seats did not fill up. The old man and the young one and the girl had that row alone. It was raw outside and that Saturday night was in the drilled to the minute for their task of salvage, cast their eyes over the crowds to select the persons who, by the interest already showing on their faces, were most likely to respond to the culminating appeal.

"And why not marry her—and let the gang go?" Beldren was saying to himself, glancing aside at Mona, her face lighted up with rapture, her eyes shining, as she leaned forward. "I might do worse. I c'n get that job that Boss Carlin promised me any day now. Why not do it—an' marry her?"

"Now, friends," Dundee said, as a great hush fell over the big space under the White Tabernacle's domed roof, "I have made my last appeal to you before another Sabbath, and I would like to have some first fruits of the new season to offer to show for my work in the Good Cause."

HIS voice had dropped into soothing, pleading minors. All the slang was gone from his lips. Reverent phrases came to take the place of violent, explosive ones uttered to enforce attention from those who understood them best. To the girl in the back row he seemed to be talking just to her. To Jim Beldren it seemed that he was addressing only Lightweight Jimmy.

The King of the Shillibers had no idea on the subject. He drowsed still.

"Won't you come, my friends?"

Dundee stretched out his arm to them.

Softly the trombone player blew a hymn phrase: "Come, all ye who are heavy laden." The chorus choir took it up. Here and there in the crowd thin voices echoed it.

"Come, all ye who are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

So Dundee, in plaintive, compelling cadences.

Here and there people stood up, as if ready to go down the sawdust trail to take the preacher's hand and give in their pledges.

The ushers and workers gazed, expectant. It was not yet time for the real answer to the appeal of the exhorter. The few who were standing, like all the others in his organization, knew their part—but waited on their accustomed cue. It needed a genuine movement from the people themselves to start the stampede down the sawdust trail. The movement had to be genuine or it would not be big—pregnant with real blessings.

"Come, and I will give rest unto your souls."

Dundee, erect on his chair now, held his right hand aloft in his characteristic ultimate gesture of invitation. It was the climax of the meeting! There was rustling through the throngs, as when wind sweeps over a field of yellowing grain, ready for the reapers—a rustling, fluttering, buzzing medley of humanity's minor stresses. Truly the harvest was ripe!

THE movement of the throng aroused Big Bill Ledyerd. Or maybe it was the recurrence of the stabbing pain in his great chest. Out of a bleared eye he saw Dundee, on his chair, down there beside the clusters of lights, his hand raised in the gesture that meant that he was—was what?

The fever mist came in on him again. Bill's imagination switched back, over the weary, Dead Sea years—

Oh, yes. It was La Rue, his friend, that he saw there ahead, his ballyho talk all done. There was a big crowd. He had shillibered for the sideshow; now it was time to shill for the concert after the big show. Afterward he would see Annie—

"Come, friends, give in your lots for God," the preacher said, softly. Two of the three up there on the top seats heard him; one did not.

"Jim," said Mona, half rising, "I'm going—" Beldren, true to his code of loyalty to his lady and to his friends—half persuaded himself—arose. Mona caught his hand, in her nervous tension. The ushers near by, recognizing in them twain the beginnings of the real movement of the people, glanced, expectant, afraid to make a wrong move. There were other evangelical campaign a pause before greater efforts to come after a week-end routine.

BILLY DUNDEE, after the preliminaries, prayers, short sermon by the pastor of a neighboring church, came to the platform, alert, dynamic. His powerful voice, penetrating everywhere, was plain to two of the three on that top row. Using the idioms of the paves, the argot of the baseball field, he began to build up his appeal to the lost, text by text, strophe by strophe, rough-hewing his way with the battle-ax of forceful eloquence into strongholds of doubt that his velvet-tongued, correct-English brethren could not even view from afar. Jim Beldren, caught in the vortex of Dundee's urgent will, felt himself stirred. Truly, this man knew how to talk. None of the mission boomers could talk as he could—in the real American language of New York. The sermon dealt with family ties, with the debts men owe to women for their sufferings as wives and mothers, and so glorified woman and flayed man for his sins against her.

Mona, hearing again those truths to which she long had been a stranger, was swept along, too, in the whirlwind of the preacher's eloquence. What attracted her failed to appeal to Beldren. She caught at the tersely put parables that Dundee sandwiched in between his sporting epigrams and attacks upon the devil. She thrilled to hear expounded so powerfully doctrines that she had not heard since her mother first had brought her into the big town.

The King of the Shillibers heard nothing. In the feverish slumber of exhaustion and pneumatic half-coma, he drowsed.

The sermon swept to its conclusion, the audience hanging on Dundee's words most intently. On a chair, onto which he had vaulted to emphasize his final acting of his intention to catch the Evil One off first base and touch him out in the last half of the ninth inning with the score 0-0, the preacher gave out his peroration, while the ushers and workers,

THE PASSING OF THE BURDEN

A SERMON

By
REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

TEXT—Ps. 55:22. "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee. He shall never suffer the righteous to be moved."

THIS is a stormy psalm, abounding in threat, indignation, fear, and pain. The tempest rages right up to the confines of my text. Here, in the text, there is a temporary lull in the violence of thought and feeling. The driven, terrified pilgrim is becoming possessed by the recovering light of assurance, and the trembling heart is quieted into momentary peace.

In the earlier outbursts, the psalmist is meditating relief from his burden by the way of flight. "Oh, had I the wings of a dove, then would I fly away." We have all known the inclination. We all know the critical moment when we are contemplating seeking relief by leaving our tasks. "I will just leave the whole thing; I will get away from it!" Such flight is usually fruitless. We carry our burden with us. On the further shore it sits upon us still.

And yet there are some types of burden in which the refuge of flight will be found to be a rare and splendid defense. "Flee youthful lusts." In these matters flight is the only method of salvation. There are some atmospheres in which evil desire inevitably becomes irritated and inflamed. Our only refuge is to get away from them. Flee from any oil that would feed the unclean desire. If you are inclined to be feverish, passionate, voluptuous, flee from the inflammatory material on which the temper is fed. Get away from inflammatory books. Give up inflammatory companionships. Seek refuge by flight. "Flee from idolatry." Do not take part for a moment in the temple worship of an alien god. Do not sit in the temple of Mammon. Do not play with worldly maxims. Do not think there is security in partial worldliness, in a moderate compromise. We do not need to wear the entire dress of a smallpox victim, in order to acquire the disease. A bit of ribbon will do it! And if we presumably turn our backs upon the world and the worship of Mammon, and yet retain and hug one worldly expediency or practice, we shall be accounted the followers of an alien god.

BUT the majority of burdens cannot be disposed of by the method of flight. In flight they are our inseparable companions. We have no resources but to cast them on God. What becomes of them when we take them to the Lord? There are some burdens which pass away, even while they are being recounted. They evaporate in the telling: To talk about them to God is to lose them! If you take a dimmed, steamed mirror into a dry, sunny room, the obscuring veil passes away, and the mirror becomes clear. And there are some burdens which perplex the spirit, and hinder its outlook, which, when we take them to the Lord, pass away like mist in the sunny light of the morning. Let me mention two or three:

There is the burden of fearfulness. What is this burden except the lack of assurance? The depression is born of uncertainty. The soul moves in fear, because it does not feel the presence of God. The lack of assurance breeds the restless offspring of anxiety, fretfulness and care. Now this is one of the burdens which evaporate in the telling. Fearfulness is always the companion of little faith. The Master has told us this in a very significant sentence. "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?" The largeness of the one term is always proportioned to the smallness of the other. If we have little faith, we must have large fearfulness. If we have triumphant faith, fearfulness is abolished. "Perfect love casteth out fear." While we are talking to our Father, the sweet genius of assurance returns. Our faith awakes. Our love revives. The heart grows calm in spiritual fellowship. "Cast thy burden upon the Lord," and, even while thou art telling it, the burden will disappear.

There is the burden of perplexity. Here, again, is a burden which frequently disappears while we are describing it. If we take it into our Father's house, even if it does not pass entirely away, it will be so eased that it will not crush us like an iron garment. We shall have freedom of movement.

It is a beautiful experience in the lives of the saints that, when they take their burden to God, they frequently find the clue even while they are bowed in prayer. The atmosphere of devotion is favorable to revelations, and visions are multiplied when souls are upon their knees. "When I thought how I might know this, it was too painful for me . . . until I went into the sanctuary of God." He took his perplexity into the presence of God, and considered it in the atmosphere of the sanctuary, and the pain and the burden of it were gone! "In thy light shall we see light."

There is the burden of guilt. No man can reverently and penitently take this burden to the Lord without losing it. It goes in the telling of it. "Father, I am no more worthy to be called thy son, make . . ." "Bring forth the best robes." The confession of ignoble sonship had not been fully uttered before the Father called for the robes of restored salvation. "So I saw in my dream, that just as Christian came up to the Cross, his burden loosed from off his shoulder, and fell from off his back." "Cast thy burden upon the Lord."

AND yet there are some burdens which are not removed even when we take them to the Lord. They do not disappear in the telling. Is there some other gracious ministry of the loving Lord? Yes, if the burden remain, the bearer of it will be strengthened. "There was given to me a thorn in the flesh. . . . Concerning this thing I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me, and he hath said to me, My grace is sufficient for thee." The apostle cast his burden upon the Lord. He asked that it might be removed. The burden remained, but the apostle was strengthened! "Mostly gladly therefore I glory in my weakness."

This is the way of the Lord. Some burdens are permitted to remain. Perhaps the burden is an unwelcome and unpleasant duty. Perhaps it is some physical infirmity. Perhaps it is prolonged labor in a wageless and most exhausting sphere. What then will God do with us! "He shall sustain thee." The Lord will deal with the bearer of the burden. He will increase thy strength, and so in reality diminish thy load. This word "sustain" is a fine, wealthy word of most comforting content! There is in it a suggestion of the ministry of a nurse. He will deal with us as though we were infants. He will be to us the great mother-God. And He will manifest toward us all the tenderness of a nursing ministry. There is also in the word the suggestion of food. He will feed us. He will give to us the bread of life. He will increase our vitality. He will make our powers more alive, more wakeful, more exuberant. And I find in the word the further gracious meaning of "support." He will carry me, if need be. "Hold thou me up!" cries one of the psalmists. The word indicates one of the beautiful ministries of our Lord. We have seen the strong elder son taking the arm of his weakly mother, and holding her up. The kindly service is illustrative of the helpful fellowship of God. "He is at thy right hand."

THE concluding word of the text is purposed to heighten the assurance of the psalmist into the peace of absolute certainty. "He shall never suffer the righteous to be moved." The life that is held by God, possessed and inspired by God, will be delivered from all trembling uncertainties. On the one hand, he will not be dismayed by a frown or a threat; nor, on the other hand, will he be enticed by some bewitching fascination. He will continue his way unmoved. The road will be straight; the walk will be firm; his footing will be sure.

The Bible appears to exult in its proclamation of the fine, confident "walk" of the man who companies with God. He does not move with the trembling solicitude of one who steps upon miry clay, but he strides out with the confident step of a man whose way is upon rock. This is ever the issue of intimate fellowship with the Lord. Men are delivered from fearfulness, and fickleness, and weakness. Their hearts are encouraged and lightened, and the heavy burden becomes a tolerable load. "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee. He shall never suffer the righteous to be moved."

THE RED TRIANGLE

LIFT up the Red Triangle
Beside the thundering guns—
A friend, a shield, a solace
To our ten million sons!
Go build a hut or dugout
By billet or by trench,
A shelter from the horror,
The cold, the filth, the stench!
Where boys we love, returning
From out the gory loam
Can sight the Red Triangle
And find a bit of home!

Lift up the Red Triangle
Against the things that maim!
It conquers Booze, the wrecker!
It shuts the House of Shame!
Go make a friendly corner,
So lads can take the pen
And get in touch with mother
And God's clean things again!
Where Hell's destroying forces
Are leagued with Potsdam's crew,
Lift up the Red Triangle—
And help our boys "come through!"

Comforted to Comfort

SUNDAY, September 8. II Cor. 1:4. "Who comforteth us in all our afflictions, that we may be able to comfort." The apostle had traveled over hard and disappointing roads. Again and again his purposes seemed to be defeated. He had long spells of apparently wasted seasons. He was afflicted in body, and mind, and soul! And yet, on those dark roads he began to make bright discoveries. Perhaps the discovery was a new interpretation of yesterday. Yesterday disclosed itself in a revelation of unsuspected significance. The looking back brought him a secret of divine providence. He found new honey in an old hive! Sometimes the new discovery is some new apprehension of the Divine Presence. "He appeared unto them in another form" as they journeyed to Emmaus. The two disciples were treading a very dark and sorrowful road. Their light had gone out in Jerusalem. The grim cross on their sky-line was the symbol of their slaughtered hopes. And now the Lord, whom they had seemingly lost, appeared to them in another and unfamiliar form. And we know the fruit of the Companionship. There was the opening word! There was the burning heart! And there was the new assurance! "They knew him." Or perhaps the new discovery is some hitherto unnoticed promise stretching out its hands from the mist-hidden and unknown morrow—a strong, generous, friendly hand. Or perhaps it is some contemplation of the Lord which is the minister of comfort, not merely a minister of soothing, but also of strength, of bread as well as rest. The divine comfort may come to the afflicted soul in one of a hundred different ways, but in every way it becomes endowed with the treasures of darkness.

And this comfort is purposed to make us comforters. We are comforted in order that we may comfort others. That is the Christian issue. The water which we discover in our souls as a well is to spring up and overflow in rivers of ministering grace. The comforted disciple is to be a comforting apostle. Indeed, the comfort which is not shared loses its strength. There are some things which have to be kept or locked up if their sweetness is to be preserved. But it is not so with divine comfort. It turns sour unless it is opened out in bounteous ministry. J. H. J.

The Spirit of Adoption

MONDAY, September 9. Rom. 8:15. "Ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father." We do no violence to the word "adoption" when we substitute for it the word "childship." Then the text reads, "We have received the spirit of childship." We have an earthly heredity, but we may have a heavenly. We may be admitted to a royalty before which the proudest royalty of earth is humble. Long, long ago a heathen prophet had a vision of the church of God. He saw its coming glory and he heard its triumph song. Thus he reports his vision: "He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath he seen perverseness in Israel: the Lord his God is with him, and the shout of a king is among them." (Num. 23:21.) "The shout of a king" means the shout of a conqueror. Anciently a king led his armies to battle, and when he returned, if the war was successful, it was with victorious shouts. Balaam saw Israel in coming ages—Israel under David; Israel under Solomon; Israel under Christ. God's church is now his Israel. And he saw a kingly and conquering church.

What is the spirit of childship about which the apostle writes? It is, first of all, the spirit of confidence, confidence which has its basis in affection. "Abba" is the Aramaic word for "father," and in the vernacular it had a meaning vastly sweeter than just father. It was the affectionate and familiar word for father, something like our word "papa." The Christian spirit of childship enables us to cry, "Dear Father, loving Father." But what is affection, and what is confidence, if there be not on the part of the child toward the father unquestioning obedience? What child would dare to speak to his father tenderly, confidentially, and withhold from him that obedience which is due a parent? So we see that on the side of privilege the spirit of childship is the spirit of royalty, but on the side of duty it is the spirit of obedience and discipline. Have we received this spirit? If not, we are still under the dominion of the spirit of bondage, we are not yet set free from the law of sin and death. C. C. A.

Seal of the Spirit

TUESDAY, September 10. Tim. 2:19. "The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his." The "foundation of God" is that which God has founded in this world, the people "that are his," the Church. To these people God has affixed a seal by which he claims them as his own. The seal in this instance answers the purpose of attesting ownership, like a trade-mark that is placed upon merchandise. Those in whom the Holy Spirit dwells are marked as God's own, as God's purchased possession. To the Corinthians Paul wrote: "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own? For ye are bought with a price." The seal of the Holy Spirit which God has placed on his believers, even as the blood of his Son which was the purchase price he paid for them, do not attest the believers' personal worth or merit, but God's gratuitous favor and the great love which he has for them. The seal of the Spirit is only an evidence of that grace which seeks to save the sinner to the uttermost. Believers are not perfect saints while they are still in the flesh. They love the Saviour and his Word; they strive to lead a life acceptable to him, but like righteous Job they may fall seven times a day. The daily observation of the weakness of their flesh, of their faults and imperfections, may beget a feeling of despondency in them. They may come to think that it is impossible that God can acknowledge them as his own, being what they are. The seal of the Holy Spirit is to assure them of their adoption in spite of their unworthiness. A treasury note stamped with the seal of the government is still accepted as good, even when it is crumpled, soiled, and torn, if only the government seal is still on it. Christians must be careful only of not losing the Holy Spirit out of their hearts amid the temptations to which they are daily exposed and in their daily conflicts with sin. The soldiers of Christ cannot always appear in shining dress parade garments, just as little as other real soldiers. When they have done real war work, they will look rather uninviting, but just for that reason they are good soldiers.

"I Will Not Forget Thee"

WEDNESDAY, September 11. Isa. 49:15. "I will not forget thee." A mother may forget her child, a father may forsake his son, but the Father in heaven will never, no never, forget his children. A young man in New York City was arrested for some trivial offence and sent to Blackwell's Island. He wrote a plea to his father to come to his rescue, but the father's pride and anger would not permit him to go to his boy. He said he had made his bed; let him sleep in it. The grieved and forsaken boy, trying to escape by swimming across the river, was drowned. The father soon was on the verge of insanity, crying, "I would give the world if I had gone to my poor boy."

Our Father God will never nuss such an opportunity to save or help a praying child. He gave his heavenly Son Jesus to save his earthly children. He came without our sending for him; we killed him, and when he came to life again, loving us, he reached out his everlasting arms to rescue those who had put him to death.

Can such love ever forget, ever forsake? It would break our Father's heart if he ever forgot one of us. Yes, a human father may turn his back upon his child, shut the door against him. He may have been an unworthy son, but then, he was his own boy. Does not the human heart recoil against such a parental attitude? We do not think it strange when a mother receives back her truant daughter; it is like an act of the Almighty, and we all say "Amen." How much more will your heavenly Father give good gifts to his returning prodigal? He bears with our infirmities, forgives our sins, touches our sickness into health, brings us to his bosom, puts on the robe and ring, spreads his table, and makes all heaven resound with rejoicing. The son was dead; he is alive again. He was lost and is found. All the bells of heaven ring and all the angels sing. A child has returned from the wild to its home in the Father's house forever.

The Perfect Will of God

THURSDAY, September 12. Rom. 12:2. "That ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God." There is a simple prayer which practically includes all other prayers: "Thy will be done." They who say this from the heart lack nothing of obedience. Charles Lamb wrote concerning one who had been greatly afflicted. "He gave his heart to the Purifier, and his will to the Supreme Will of the universe." Mr. Gladstone said of a certain line from Dante's "Paradise" that "these words have an inexpressible majesty of truth almost as if spoken by the very mouth of God." The words referred to may be thus rendered, "In God's will is our peace." Not only is inward peace secured by conformity to the will of God, but all other needed graces flow out of that surrender—purity, power, acceptable service, fortitude, self-control, and that charity which is the bond of perfection.

America has not had a more intellectual poet nor one capable of finer "wing-work" than Sidney Lanier. His wife writes of the last days of his life: "We are left alone with one another. On the last night of the summer comes a change. His love and immortal will hold off the destroyer yet one more week until the forenoon of September 7, and then falls the frost, and that unfaltering will renders its supreme submission to the adored will of God." Such is the spirit of the saint—to adore the good and acceptable and perfect will of God. C. C. A.

Labor

FRIDAY, September 13. Ex. 20:9. "Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work." Labor is God's law, written in men's heart at their creation and embodied in the decalogue. Adam worked in paradise. He was told that he must subdue the earth. The bounties which God had placed in lavish profusion in every part of the earth man was to make serviceable to himself by his own exertion. Labor, therefore, is the God-appointed measure by which man is to fulfil his mission on earth. Solomon tells him: "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might." With the increase of the human race, facilities for labor were increased, just as the demands for it became greater and varied. A division of labor into distinct crafts and trades took place, each person following the suggestion of his fancy and the direction of his genius. Cattle-raising was divided from agriculture in the first family. Later the professions arose: there were smiths, masons, carpenters, etc. The godliest men whom Scripture mentions had their chosen occupation: Peter's host at Joppa was a fuller, the great apostle Paul was a tent-maker, the evangelist Luke a physician. Honest labor is, accordingly, throughout the Scriptures regarded as a mark of piety. Of the man who fears the Lord and walks in his ways the Psalmist says: "Thou shalt eat the labor of thine hands. Happy shalt thou be, and it shall be well with thee." The parable of the laborers in the vineyard is taken from life. When in the congregation at Thessalonica a disturbance had occurred which caused the members to throw aside their ordinary occupations, Paul wrote them such strong admonitions as these: "We hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busybodies. Now then that are such we command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work and eat their own bread." All this goes to show that Christians must be about their business, if they do not wish to displease God. And they must finish it so as to have time for the Lord's business, when the day of rest comes. W. H. T. D.

Afflictions

SATURDAY, September 14. II Cor. 12:7. "There was given me a thorn in the flesh, lest I should be exalted above measure." The answer to Paul's prayer for the removal of his malady came in the memorable words of the Master. "My grace is sufficient for thee." "Your strength is made perfect in weakness." Afterward, Paul learned how to glory in all infirmities and trials, that the power of Christ might rest upon him. When he was weak, then was he strong. A similar instance was when Jacob received the great blessing at Peniel. He became conscious of his own weakness by the touch of the angel's hand and though lame, he achieved lofty triumphs.

Abraham had his Ishmael, David his Saul and sorrow, Isaiah his persecutors, Jeremiah his jail. Many millions were destitute, afflicted, tormented through the early centuries, before and after Christ; Milton had his blindness, Bunyan his prison, John Howard his dissolute son, Pascal and Robert Hall their lifelong pain, while the multitudes of all the ages have felt the arrow of bereavement piercing their own hearts as it passed through the hearts of loved ones.

Every heart knoweth its own bitterness; with some it is a secret sorrow; with others, an open, public pain. Should we not all remember that whatever our peculiar trouble, we may rally from the hurt and become as strong as Almighty God to do all things by his power? Our pain or weakness may be the open door for the Christ to enter the heart.

You might think you would choose some other affliction than the divinely given one, but he who remembers that we are dust, knoweth best.

World Missions and the World War

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D., Founder of Christian Endeavor

WHAT will be the influence of the war, which in effect reaches every corner of the habitable globe, upon missionary enterprises in all lands? It is a far-reaching question, and cannot be answered offhand. Will the constant drain on the resources of Christian people demanded by the insistent, continuous and absolutely necessary demands of the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., the Community War Funds, and a dozen other good causes connected with the war, to say nothing of Liberty Loans, which reduce the income that would be derived from other investments, at length seriously affect the treasuries of our missionary societies?

Will the constant excitement which the war generates lead Christian people to forego the reading of papers and magazines that are not spiced with battles and adventures in the air or in or under the sea, so that sober missionary information can have no chance?

Will the inevitable reorganization of the world, changing national boundaries, wiping out whole nationalities like the Armenians, transferring colonies from one government to another, make for or against missionary enterprise?

These are serious and perplexing questions. We can, however, get some light on them from considering the present trend of affairs. "I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided," said Patrick Henry. "I know of no way of judging of the future but by the past."

THE four years of war, to be sure, do not give us a long "past" from which to generalize, but they do furnish many straws to show that the wind is blowing from the right direction. The effect of the monetary demands of the war upon the missionary treasuries is one of these straws. With very few exceptions there has been no diminution in the number or amount of gifts to missions. The treasuries of many boards are fuller than ever. Great enterprises for the enlargement of the work at home and abroad, involving millions of dollars, have been undertaken by some denominations, like the Methodist, at the very "peak and crisis" of the war. Campaigns have been launched of late for the endowment of schools and colleges in this and other lands, which a few years ago would have been deemed hopeless, and yet they have succeeded. Missionary authorities, instead of scaling down their demands upon the church for money, have increased them, in view of the higher cost of living, the unfavorable rate of exchange and the occupation of new fields, and these demands have been approved and met by the churches.

Not only is this true in America; but in Great Britain, which has endured the strain and depletion of war so much longer than we, this is true. Her missionary treasuries after these long and weary years of conflict at her very doors, I understand, have not been unfavorably affected.

The truth is that Christian people, by the demands of the war, are learning to give. The appeals of the government and of the peoples that are starving and homeless have touched the generous chord, and their hearts have opened wide to the needs of the world. Many who thought they had nothing to give have found out that they were greatly mistaken, and have learned that not the money and time, but the will, had been lacking. Others who before gave moderately and perhaps grudgingly out of their abundance have learned the joy of larger giving. They gave until they felt it, and then they kept on giving until they did not feel it, or at least until the pain of parting with their substance was swallowed up in the joy of having a stake in a great and good cause.

So I think we may dismiss the fear that missionary enterprises will be crippled in the future by lack of willing givers.

But, again, said the doubting Christian, admitting that this may be true, is it not probable that the news of the war and other matters growing out of the war may become so absorbing that there shall be no time for prayer and sympathetic attention to missionary matters, so that eventually lack of knowledge and interest may dry up the sources of missionary zeal?

This is certainly a danger. Yet on the other side, we must remember that the war is increasing vastly the knowledge of many missionary lands. The peoples of the world today form a huge class in modern geography. The daily papers are our textbooks. Millions of people know far more about Armenia, for instance, than they did two years ago. They can point out Van and Erzurum and Tabriz and Kiochau and Harbin and Bagdad and Beirut on the map—places that a few months ago were mere names to them, perhaps not even names of which they had ever heard. Yet all these places, and a hundred others which are becoming familiar to us, are in the missionary zone.

WE read of the faithful Indian troops fighting with the British, of a hundred thousand Chinese cultivating war gardens and digging trenches in France, of our brave Allies, the Japanese, keeping the Pacific open to the commerce of the world, of the Boers and the African natives siding with what we believe is the cause of righteousness and justice, and our hearts go out to all of them. We feel our kinship with all these co-workers and co-fighters as never before, and we shall, I believe, be more eager than ever to share with them the blessings of the Gospel of Christ.

So, whatever loss there may be in the dissipation of energy and interest owing to the war will be more than made up in the tremendous offsetting enlargement of our knowledge and sympathies as a result of the war.

Moreover, the splendid record made by missionaries in many fields since the war began cannot but react favorably upon the public mind. No one can read of the heroic devotion of the Crawfords of Trebizond, the Merrilles in Aintab, of Mary Mathews in Monastir living for weeks with her orphans in a cellar while the bombs fell in the mission compound, of Miss Grafiam alone in Sivas, of Miss Vaughan, the only missionary in the lonesome station of Hadjin, high up in the Anti-Taurus Mountains, and scores of others of whom I might write, without being moved to the deepest admiration for their dauntless courage and self-sacrifice. No soldier boy in the front line trenches, no shock-troops storming a battery, no aviator leading a forlorn hope against a fleet of hostile airplanes, has suffered more, or displayed more undaunted bravery, than have many of these missionaries in Turkey and Persia.

THE most convinced and ignorant mission-hater, if he reads the papers at all, must by this time know something of the stuff of which missionaries are made, and acknowledge their preëminent devotion to their fellow men. Talk about social service! There has been no such social service rendered since the world began, so far as I have read history, as these brave missionaries have given to the despoiled Armenians, and to friends and enemies alike on the battle-fields and in the hospitals of Asia Minor.

Unquestionably there will be geographical changes in national boundaries and changes of sovereignty as well, but I cannot see that these changes will work disastrously to mission enterprises in the long run. In many ways the war will improve the status of missions and missionaries. For instance, it is most unlikely that Palestine will ever again fall into the hands of the Turk. Under British or French or Jewish rule the missionary will have far more freedom than under Moslem control. Syria, too, will undoubtedly be wrested from Turkish sovereignty, and, let us hope, Armenia as well. Then in these lands Christian schools and Christian churches will flourish as never before.

Russia for long centuries has been closed to any Gospel except that of the Greek Church. A personal experience taught me how tant the ecclesiastical reins were drawn just before the war. I was asked to address a little Christian Endeavor gathering at Riga on the Baltic. Knowing that there might be difficulty in securing permission to speak, I applied for such permission from Petrograd (then St. Petersburg) through our ambassador, Hon. Curtis Guild, formerly governor of Massachusetts. Mr. Guild was a personal friend, and did his utmost to secure permission for me to speak on a purely religious theme to this humble little gathering of young Christians. Time after time he visited the Foreign Office, but was put off with one excuse after another.

At last the hour of the meeting arrived, and still permission had not been granted. The Endeavorers were on their knees praying that the meeting might be allowed and I might have leave to speak, since I had come so far. Just at the last minute a telegram was handed in which, in effect, said that, though formal permission could not be granted, I might go on with my address, provided the police of Riga did not object. All this fuss and feathers and red tape to prevent an American minister from giving a simple Gospel message!

NOW all is changed. The most populous nation of the world, with one exception, has by the war been opened to the preaching of the religion of Christ. Though Russia is torn and bleeding from internal enemies and external foes, she will never again be closed to the Protestant faith. Within little more than a year she has become one of the largest and most promising mission fields in the world.

The readjustments of the war will doubtless make Africa and the islands of the sea quite as accessible to missionary influence, to say the least, as before. As to the vast fields of India and China, there will perhaps be little difference in their status, but what difference there may be will undoubtedly be favorable to the influence of Western missionaries. Both have come more and more into the family of the Allied nations since the war began. India's troops have been fighting our battles alongside of their lighter-hued Aryan brethren. China's laborers, as I have said, have been doing valiant work in the rehabilitation of France, and in raising food for her soldiers.

The influence of Christian nations, and, we may hope, of Christian missions in these lands will be more potent than ever before. To be sure, these peoples who fight our battles will see the worst as well as the best side of Christianity. They will see the harsh, militaristic side, but they will also see the devotion and heroism of soldiers fighting for a great idea. They will see mercy and good-will exemplified in the care of the sick and wounded, enemies and friends alike. They will see the work of the Y. M. C. A. and the Red Cross, and we may hope that the sum total of the impressions they carry back will be of the gracious, kindly side of nominally Christian nations.

In any event, the war will influence these peoples as well as those more immediately concerned, and I believe it will enlarge their view, diminish their national conceit, and open their eyes to the best things in the civilization and the religion of the West.

If the League of Free Nations for which we pray comes about, we may expect that the resultant fellowship and good-will will work mightily toward the breaking down of ancient prejudices and the opening of all missionary lands to the triumphant advance of the religion of Jesus Christ. God grant it! So may it be!

Among the Workers

"FIVE hundred dollars will train a boy to become an honest and trustworthy man, whereas it will take two thousand dollars to train a man when he is eighteen or twenty, and then you will have that man to watch." That is the motto of the Jenkins Orphanage, founded in 1891 by Rev. D. J. Jenkins, pastor of the New Tabernacle Fourth Church, Charleston, S. C., for the reclamation of delinquent colored children. The proportion of children who go wrong after leaving the Orphanage is so small as to be almost negligible. The Orphanage has a farm of 200 acres at Charleston, where the inmates are given an industrial education. The City Council of Charleston has for the last twenty years aided the institution by grants of money. All the male students over eighteen are in the United States Army, 100 of these being at the front in France. The famous band, which has given concerts on many occasions, notably at the Anglo-American Exposition in London in 1914, has been broken up by the war, all of its members having joined the armed forces of Uncle Sam. A fine choir of Jubilee Singers, consisting of seventy-five of the students of the Orphanage, are now touring the country giving musical entertainments, and are at the service of any church.

DR. LEVI B. SALMANS of the Good Samaritan Mission, Guanajuato, Mexico, writes acknowledging gifts from Christian Herald readers for his medical mission work, and adds: "I am spending all such contributions upon the building, and have been doing this from the year 1894 till now. Our property now is worth $60,000 American money, and it has all come from donations thus invested. I am now in my sixty-fourth year, and am warned by the almanac that I must make haste to get things in order for another to take them up. I must finish the building and equipping of this plant, which has already put itself in excellent repute with 95,000 patients and with a million of the general public, most of whom are very poor, and also either Catholic or utterly indifferent or hostile to religion. We have already fifty-five rooms finished and in use and twelve more constructed and roofed, but not finished enough to be put into use."

REV. C. A. DOUGLAS, of Teheran, died on February 9 from typhus fever contracted in Relief Work. He had been doing a great deal of work, and had visited many poor hovels in the hospital quarter of the city. Money and rice are being given out from eight centers to nearly 5,000 individuals. Lady Marling has opened a soup kitchen supported by the foreign community, where over 800 people are fed daily. Still many are dying of hunger. Bread is very scarce and at six times the usual price. For three months famine relief work has been going on at Meshed, Persia. The Presbyterian missionaries are feeding more than three thousand people daily. The number of destitute is estimated all the way from 10,000 to 25,000. Typhoid is epidemic.

AN important ten days' conference of Sunday school secretaries and workers, representing the World's Sunday School Association in the Philippines, Korea, China and Japan, was recently held in Shanghai, China. Some of the vital topics considered were Organization, Promotion, Literature, Standards, Evangelism, Teacher Training, the Sabbath and Temperance.

REV. H. B. ROLLER, evangelist, who recently completed his second tour preaching to the soldiers in the camps, began a revival meeting in West Baden, Ind., a great resort, on Sunday, July 7, and at the end of the first week the meetings had stirred the town and many had claimed conversion and united with the church, with many more interested.

The Silent Audience

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"IT'S so much easier," the girl told me half-laughing, "to do a worthwhile thing in front of—well, an audience! Particularly if it's a hard thing."

"I don't think," I ventured, "that I quite understand what you mean."

The girl hesitated a moment before she answered.

"Well, it's this way," she said at last. "This morning while I was on the porch talking to our next door neighbor, my little brother came out with a torn stocking in his hand. It was a very special baseball stocking of his, and he wanted it mended at once."

"I don't like to mend stockings, and I am afraid that if I'd been in the house by myself I might have told my little brother so. But out on the porch, with my neighbor watching me, I took that stocking in my hands and darned it with never a thought of not wanting to. It's very strange."

"It is strange," I murmured, and waited for her to expand her idea. After a minute she did.

"I imagine," she told me, "that it must be easier for the average soldier to be brave when he is going over the top with the rest of his company than it is for him to be brave when he is sent on scout duty alone. Perhaps I am wrong, but there is a certain strange psychological thing about the presence of other people—a feeling that's one-third encouragement, and one-third inspiration, and one-third desire to appear at one's best."

"Of course, when I mended my brother's baseball stocking for him this morning, I was only doing what I very likely would have done under any circumstances. But had I been alone in my room, darning that stocking, I would have drawn the rough edges together carelessly, in a 'good-enough way,' and I would probably not have accepted the task as graciously as I accepted it in front of my neighbor on the porch."

"Having that neighbor as an audience made my darning better. Although I did not formulate the thought, I know that underneath my absorption in my work there was a certain feeling of pleasure in the fact that my neighbor was having the chance to see that I could darn stockings—and darn them very well. There was a certain subconscious pride in the fact that she would see how ready I was to help my brother. It made the task much easier! But, now that I'm admitting things, I'm afraid that I am not exactly proud of feeling that way, for it seems an almost self-conscious, conceited state of mind. And yet I fancy that a great many people do have that feeling."

IT was a moment before I spoke. For I was remembering a certain cold day when I had gone swimming alone and had lingered on the beach for nearly half an hour before I had dared go into the icy water. And I was remembering another day when I had very gaily splashed into equally cold water, another day when I had been with a crowd of young people who had not feared the chill.

"I don't think it's anything to be ashamed of," I answered at last, and slowly; "it's just human nature to want always to be at one's best before people. Nobody likes to do things that other folk will laugh about. Nobody likes to be a quitter, or cowardly in any way. People like to be thought pleasant, and as brave as possible, and—well, game."

"Then," the girl spoke thoughtfully, "then it would be better, wouldn't it, if we could always have an audience of people who would spur us on to do our best? It would be better if we could always feel that some one was watching and listening? And—"

"I think it would!" I told her soberly.

The value of an audience—it's an interesting thing to think about! When you are by yourself—writing, or working, or sewing—it's something of a test to stop suddenly and say, "Would I do this more thoroughly and efficiently if I were being watched?" And the answer is very often a revelation.

ONCE read the story of a man who had done a great wrong to another man—a very great wrong indeed. But he was quite heartless about it, and never bothered much about the suffering he had caused, until his victim suddenly died. And then, all at once, he found that he was conscious of a presence—a haunting, reproachful presence—that was with him at all times.

At first, being a typically story-book villain, he did not mind the presence that obtruded itself upon him. But as time wore on and he found himself waking from sleep with a start, and looking nervously into dark corners, and seeing curious resemblances to his victim on strange faces, he began to grow thin and worried. He began to wear a furtive look, a hunted expression. And then, finally, he became weak and ill—and at last, raving deliriously of eyes that kept following him, he died.

It wasn't a pleasant story. But one, reading it, could not fail to see the moral that it pointed. For it was an allegory, and the villain in reality haunted by nothing but the knowledge of his wrong deed.

AUDIENCE? Every one, always. As has an audience! Some people call the audience conscience, and it is always with you—always watching, always listening.

And so we, who realize that we can do things in a more worth-while way if we are being watched, should always try to remember that silent audience! And we should do our tasks well, and we should be kind and gentle and considerate, and we should never be careless or lazy just because we think that nobody will ever guess that we are being careless and lazy.

We should, in short, do our very best and be our very best to please ourselves. For we always know when a task is well done, and we can usually tell when it has been badly done. And if we make of ourselves a critical audience, we will, I am sure, please that audience that lives in our hearts and minds and souls—the audience that is called Conscience.

From out of my heart there spoke a voice—
A calm little voice and still—
And it said to me, "Have you done your part,
With a steady, cheerful will?
Have you brushed the care from another's life?
Have you smiled in the face of dread?
Have you done your part?" asked the voice of me.

And I wondering spoke, and said:
"What are you, Voice, that you ask me this?
Why do you seem to care
Whether I shirked my task or not,
Whether I did my share?"
And the voice rose out of my heart again,
And it said, "I am just the trace
Of the hand of God that is stretched to you,
And the smile that lights his face!"

American Lutheran Convention

MANY of the honors were carried off by camp pastors at the recent Lutheran convention of the English District, held at Chicago, June 27 to July 1. A camp pastor, Rev. Arthur R. G. Hanser of Brooklyn, N. Y., was chaplain of the convention. Other camp pastors present and prominently participating were: Rev. O. C. Kreinheder, St. Paul, Minn.; Rev. Martin Walker, Buffalo, N. Y.; Rev. H. P. Eckhardt, Pittsburgh, Pa. The last named preached the convention sermon.

The treasuries of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri own $97,000 in Liberty Bonds, one of the largest amounts owned by any church body in the United States. The following churches were received into membership of Synod: Mt. Olive, Chicago, Ill.; St. Paul's, West New York, N. J.; Hope, Chicago, Ill.; and Mt. Olive, Detroit, Mich. Pastors received: J. A. Leimer, Chicago, Ill.; Robert L. Lail, Catawba, N. C.; Arthur T. Bartling and K. H. Ehlers of Pittsburgh, Pa. Lutheran loyalty was voiced in a series of resolutions encouraging popular support of the work of the Lutheran Church Board for Army and Navy. The next convention will be held at Redeemer Church, Ft. Wayne, Ind.

"Are You Using the Right Oil?"

Inferior oils play the mischief with sewing machines. They collect dust, dirt and lint in the delicate bearings. As you value your machine, don't use them! Repair men sometimes "knock" 3-in-One because they have their own brands of oil to sell.

3-in-One The Universal Oil for ALL Sewing Machines

3-in-One is light enough to flow to the bottom of the deepest bearing, relieving immediately every hidden point of friction. And it has the necessary viscosity, or "body," to remain in the mechanism. It wears longer and does more service than any other sewing machine oil.

3-in-One is just a pure oil compound that never gums—never dries out. Instead of gathering dirt, it really works all dirt out of the bearings. Keeps the entire mechanism clean, bright and free from harmful friction. Saves many dollars in repair bills.

Oil the treadle, hand-wheel and shuttle with good, pure 3-in-One. Then watch your machine run! Polish the case with 3-in-One—this preserves the wood and brings out the beauty of the grain. Use 3-in-One on all nicked parts—it prevents rust and tarnish. 3-in-One is sold at all stores, in 25c Handy Oil Cans and 15c, 25c and 50c bottles.

FREE A liberal sample of 3-in-One Oil and Dictionary of Uses free for the asking.

FOR WAR AND WORK

The wheels of war look keenly to lubrication. Incorrect lubrication makes for destruction from within as unerringly as shell-fire makes for destruction from without. Turn to any fighting front for the vivid lesson of lubrication.

The motor assets of the nation, whether under fire at the front, or in city streets at home, must survive as long as proper care can make them survive. Your motor cars and trucks will stand up longer if you lubricate with Havoline Oil. A vast majority of America's better-class motorists prefer Havoline Oil.

This correctly graded lubricant, represented by Havoline Light, Havoline Medium, and Havoline Heavy, lubricates any car to the limit of scientific possibility.

The lubrication of your truck is as important as the make of your truck.

The finest make of truck is a failure unless its multitude of engaging parts is protected by correct lubrication against destructive friction.

Havoline Oil cuts down upkeep, fuel-cost, replacements, and delayed deliveries by oiling every bearing with a film of oil that keeps metal from rubbing against metal.

Havoline Oil gives complete lubrication. An inferior lubricant which breaks down under heat and gear-pressure gives you only partial lubrication. And partial lubrication means an imperfect gas seal, loss of mileage on gas, scorched cylinder-walls, broken piston-rings, broken bearings, shorter life of your truck, and lower re-sale value.

The argument for Havoline Oil applies just as forcibly to passenger cars as to trucks, tanks, aeroplanes, or machine guns.

Ask for Havoline in the sealed container. Havoline greases are compounded of Havoline Oil and pure, sweet tallow. Clean to handle and correct in body.

"King Corn in Infancy," and Other Matters

NO less than six correspondents have written to me begging for other methods than canning for preserving for winter use what one lively housewife calls "King Corn in Infancy." Says one, wisely:

We have no more delicious vegetable than the distinctively American product, green corn. If preserved at all, it should be done at once. And it is proverbially uncertain when canned at home, to say nothing of the expense of cans, etc. I have heard that it may be salted down successfully and that it keeps well and sweet all winter. I have a hazy recollection of hearing my mother say that you gave a recipe for this in one of your earlier household manuals. You will confer a favor upon others as well as upon myself by instructing us how to put up green corn in this or in some less troublesome, expensive and uncertain way than by canning. YOUNG HOUSE-KEEPER (Delaware).

Over thirty years ago I wrote and published what I think your mother referred to:

Green corn is difficult to can, but I know it will keep well if put up in this way:

Boil on the cob until the milk will not flow if the grains be pricked. Then cut from the cob and pack in stone jars in the following order: A layer of fine dry salt at the bottom, half an inch thick. Next, one of corn two inches in depth; on this another half-inch of salt, and so on until the jar is nearly filled. Let the topmost layer of salt be one inch thick, and cover this with melted (not hot!) lard. Press upon this, when it is nearly hard, thick white paper cut to fit the jar. Keep in a cool place. Soak over night before using it. Strange to say, it will be so fresh after this soaking as to require salt when it is cooked for the table. Should the upper layer be slightly musty, dig lower still and you will be rewarded for the search.

After a generation of housemothers have tried this recipe, I have no scruples against republishing it. For years it was a standard formula in my own family and was invariably satisfactory.

Several recipes for canning corn cheaply have come to us in anticipation of the demand.

No. 1

I see in the Corner of July 10 a request for a recipe for canning corn. The enclosed is simple and sure: To ten cups of green sweet-corn cut carefully from the cob add one cup of sugar and the same of salt. Bring to a boil, cook half an hour, and can while very hot. When it is wanted for use, soak in warm or cold water until it is "fresh." I have used this recipe for years and never had a can spoil.

May I add a postscript to your recipe for Potato Salad? Hard-boiled eggs, pounded fine and added to potato salad, improve it very much. Mrs. H. C. (Iowa).

No. 2

May I tell sister Cornerites how to can corn so that it will keep? Many in our village use this method:

Cut the corn from the cob and scrape it down to get all of the sweetness. Then allow to five pints of the corn a scant half pint of salt and the same of sugar, with one pint of water. Mix thoroughly and cook as for immediate use. Sterilize the jars, and when the corn is ready can as usual. It will only require half an hour to freshen it for table use. Put the corn into a small colander and pour water through and over it, letting it stand in it for a few minutes. Mrs. E. C. G. (Kansas).

No. 3 will find a place in a later issue. Other matters demand earlier attention. A mother writes:

I enclose a cutting from a Milwaukee paper, that may be of use to the many who are having trouble in managing substitutes for white flour.

Any satisfactory recipe containing wheat flour may be used by substituting for one cup of wheat flour either: barley flour, one cup; buckwheat flour, three-quarters of a cup; corn flour, three-quarters of a cup; corn meal, three-quarters of a cup; corn starch, one-half cup; potato flour, three-quarters of a cup; rolled oats (ground), one cup; oatmeal flour, one cup; or rice flour, three-quarters of a cup.

Good combinations of substitutes: barley and corn flour; corn flour and oatmeal; barley and oatmeal flour; buckwheat and corn flour; corn starch and oatmeal; corn flour and corn starch; barley and corn starch.

I should like to have some simple recipe for sandwiches printed within the next month—something that one could put in a little boy's lunch for school. I thank you for the helpful recipes you have given us. Mrs. J. H. D. (Wisconsin).

Taking the topics suggested in your letter in the order in which they come, I think it but fair to housewives who are hoping for a return to the free use of wheat flour, to append to your list of available substitutes a notice issued by the Federal Food Administration:

It appears that some misapprehension has been caused by the circulation of a report that white wheat flour may be used without substitutes under this modification. It should be clearly understood that there has been no modification of the substitute rule so far as white flour is concerned.

This modification applies only to the use of whole wheat and graham flours. Any baker who uses white flour without the prescribed amount of substitutes will be guilty of violation of the substitute rule.

Now for the homier theme of the schoolboy luncheon: I take it for granted that you, like the ardent patriot we believe you to be, obey the restrictions relative to the use of meat upon certain days. With this in mind, we offer a list of sandwiches which will spare the family purse and yet tickle the palate of a hungry boy. I hope he is fond of cheeses of divers sorts. They should take the place of meats several times each week in making up our bills-of-fare. They are nourishing and, in hot weather, far more wholesome than meat. The same may be said of

Egg Sandwiches

Mash the yolks of hard-boiled eggs to a powder, and moisten with salad oil and a few drops of vinegar. Work this to a paste and season with salt and pepper—and (if you like) a drop or two of tobasco sauce. The boy would probably prefer his sandwich without this piquante dash of flavoring. Now chop the whites of the eggs until they, too, are a coarse powder and mix them with the yolk-paste. Spread between slices of buttered graham, or other brown bread.

Instead of soiling a napkin daily in preparing the boy's luncheon, provide yourself with an abundance of sheets of firm tissue paper and wrap the sandwiches in these, putting in an extra sheet to serve as a finger-napkin when the meal is concluded.

Nut Sandwiches

English walnuts, pecans, or freshly roasted peanuts, may be used for these. If peanuts, shell and skin while they are warm. English, or black walnuts or pecans must be blanched by pouring boiling water over them and while they are hot, rubbing off the skins. Let them get cold before crushing them with a rolling-pin or chopping fine. It is well to do this the day before the sandwiches are to be made, to spare mother and boy time next morning. Blanch and skin a "lot," and keep in the refrigerator ready for pounding or chopping. To each tablespoonful of chopped or crushed nutmeats, allow half as much cream- or cottage-cheese. Season with pepper and salt and spread upon thin slices of crustless brown bread.

Cottage Cheese Sandwiches

Spread cottage-cheese upon buttered slices of brown bread, and lay between these a leaf of crisp lettuce dipped in oil and vinegar. Wrap securely in two thicknesses of tissue paper and warn our boy not to put the parcel into his pocket or any other warm place.

Sweet Sandwiches

Every John, Jr., has a sweet tooth. Some have a whole set of them! Add to the cheese or meat sandwiches a "sweetie" for dessert.

Raisin Sandwiches

Chop seeded raisins and a strip of candied orange peel into a paste, add a few drops of lemon juice, and spread upon thin slices of buttered bread or between buttered crackers.

Fig (or Date) and Nut Sandwiches

If dates are used, skin them and remove the stones, before chopping them into a thick paste. Wash figs and dry them well; then chop in like manner. Add as much minced English walnuts or pecans; work in a little butter beaten soft with a spoonful of cream, and spread between thin crustless slices of bread.

Of course every housemother knows how to substitute cold meat, sliced or minced, for any of the fillings above given. Just at present, we are intent upon satisfying a healthy boy's appetite with something that will make him forget ham, corned beef and hashed mutton.

May I ask if kerosene is meant when a member speaks of soaking bricks in coal-oil in the issue of July 17? May I tell fellow Cornerites of my way of making molasses cookies? I use one cup of oatmeal and one of cornmeal with the same of barley flour. We like the cookies better than when they are made with wheat flour alone. Mrs. R. A. T. (New York).

By "coal oil" our member means kerosene. The plan she outlines has been tried and approved repeatedly by fuel-savers.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THE World's Evangelical Alliance has this year announced earlier than usual its suggested topics for the Week of Prayer, January 5 to January 12, 1919. Later in the year, when the event is not so far away, we will print the full list of topics. It is enough just at this time to set all our thoughts forward to this week, which has become by common consent "The Week of Prayer." The promise to the "two or three" is multiplied by millions when all Christendom is on its knees, and this year we have even greater need for humility and supplication. In victories growing day by day, we see at last the coming of the triumph of right over might, of humanity over brute force. God's hand is in events; let us beware lest we glory in our own might and forget to give him the glory. And let us pray that we may have grace to lead the world back, in the days of peace, to the reign of ordered law and justice, of national liberty and individual freedom, of acknowledged faith and personal salvation, upon which alone we can build a lasting structure of international peace and good-will. There is much to pray for and much need for prayer, and it is not too soon to begin to plan for a full observance of The Week of Prayer.

Mrs. L. B. asked God to send an evangelist to lead the people of her town to forsake their sins. The prayer was not answered in the way she asked, but a consecrated Sunday school superintendent came, and already the good seed is bearing fruit. Mrs. L. B. also thanks God for improvement in the mental health of her son.

L. M. H., who has read the testimonies to answered prayer since childhood, praises God publicly for an answer to prayer too sacred to be put on paper.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Charlottesville, Va.; Ooltewah, Tenn.; Port Blakely, Wash.; Clarksville, Va.; Sag Harbor, N. Y.; Queensboro, N. Y. (to have a great revival and to show those who do not go to church what Jesus would have them do); Rutledge, Tenn. (that may be saved during revival); Pocahontas, Tenn. (at the M. E. Church); Elkhart, Ind. (that many may be saved during revival).

Miss S. H. M., Mount Sterling, Ky., asks prayer that a minister may be sent there this fall; Miss S. R. P., that a useful and influential pastor may soon be found for a church which under suitable leadership might do a great and much-needed work.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

Mrs. W. L., Traverse City, Mich.; T. A. T., Pompeii, Mich.; Mrs. M. D., Newark, N. Y.; Mrs. A. B. S., Abbeville, La.; S. R., Muskogee, Okla.; Mrs. W. A. C., Rougemont, N. C.; D. L. H., Montague, Mich.; M. S., Peotone, Ill.; E. M., Camp Grant, Iowa; J. W. K., Harlan, Iowa; E. S., McPherson, Kan.; J. C., Porterville, Ala.; Mrs. E. A. R., Wellsville, N. Y.

"I'll Heat Your Whole House Through Only One Register"

I AM the CALORIC—the Original Patented PIPELESS Furnace.

I HAVE revolutionized the old methods of furnace heating by doing away with expensive, ugly, heat-wasting pipes.

I NEED but one register, and that on the ground floor, to heat all your home, be it three rooms or eighteen, thoroughly and evenly, upstairs and down.

I AM, therefore, as suitable for your old house as for a new one. Just a corner in your cellar for me and my fuel and a place above for my register.

I HEAT by Nature's own method—circulation. Sending up great volumes of moist, balmy warmth, I draw in thru the outer part of my register the cold air my heat displaces. This is re-heated, purified by my fire and sent forth again to add to your comfort.

I PRESERVE the health of your family. Just as running water purifies itself, so my method of circulating heat means pure warm air to breathe.

I SAVE you money by heating your whole house with no more coal than you need for heating two or three rooms with stoves. My maker guarantees I will save you at least a third; thousands of my friends say I save them half, and more.

I AM BUILT by the oldest and largest makers of stoves and furnaces and sold by several thousand of the leading dealers throughout the country. Both my maker and your dealer guarantee my claims to be utmost.

I WANT to come to your home to bring you, as I have to 50,000 others, increased comfort, greater convenience, better health in winter, and with it all a great saving of money. Will you have me? I can come right away, as my installation requires only one day, without interrupting your present heat.

Write my makers for a very interesting catalog telling all about pipeless heating in general and me in particular. Send for it today.

Winning the World to Christ

International Sunday School Lesson for September 15
Matt. 5:13-16 and 28:18-20; Acts 16:6-15

How Christians Can Better Their Community, Nation and World

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

OUR Scripture Readings include the sayings of Jesus, comparing his disciples to the saving salt and the guiding light of the world; pass on to his Great Commission to them and to us to make disciples and to teach them and help them, and conclude with the Macedonian call in Paul's vision, which is an emblem of the world's appeal today. The Lesson Committee adds, in parenthesis: "May be used with Missionary Applications." Could it be properly used without? It is nothing but a great Missionary Lesson through and through. At home and abroad, the task is essentially one. Every one of us owes a duty to "begin at Jerusalem" in our own community, to "go out into all Judea" in our beloved America, and to have a share in ministering to the "utmost parts of the earth."

It is worth while for any Bible class to consider the various fields of Christian endeavor, in search of opportunities for larger service. Let us make this a very practical lesson, and instead of thinking of missionary heroes, or setting forth the equipment and activities of various Christian forces, let us just ask ourselves where we can serve.

What Can Our Class Do for Our Town?

Local needs differ widely, and it is not for a stranger to decide what you ought to do. Put the above title on the blackboard and get your suggestions from the class. The best thing one can do for almost any community is to strengthen the Church and make it effective, raise more money for a more efficiently conducted enterprise, beautify the very building till it will stand comparison with the bank and the great industrial plant. "Make the Church of Christ count in our town." Well, how? What can we do as a class? To begin: Have every one in the class attend church for ten Sundays, bringing a visitor along each time. Sit together and see what will happen.

Many a town is sadly overchurched. It needs more Christian co-operation above anything else. This is a propitious time for cultivating a better spirit, leading, if possible, to federation. Ah, how great the need for prayer for guidance, for wisdom and patience! But adult Bible classes have led to federated churches in more than one community. If this is your town's need, undertake the task with the sole aim of letting the light of the Gospel shine clearly, instead of the smoky candles of rival dying churches. There is a new opportunity to federate today, when men of all creeds are fighting, serving, dying together. Remarkable progress in Christian co-operation will be made this coming year in America. Why not in your town?

Many a town is witnessing a breakup of home life as more and more women go into factory and store. One Bible class started a day nursery. For only ten cents a day, a mother can leave her little child in good care, where he will have two nice meals of bread and milk and fruit. Now, girls and women are sewing little garments. Pictures of Jesus and the Children and the Good Shepherd preach the Gospel for little tots. A Sunday class in the church has been begun which is really a mothers' meeting for discussing the duties of parents and the problems of those who toil. Is all this Christian, some one asks? Nothing more so. Of course, children are in Sunday school and mothers in church as one result.

Another Bible class conducts a lunch-room for working girls, hiring a chef and doing the serving themselves every noon. In October, countless wise churches begin their fall enlistment campaign. Some of these have been instituted in the school, and gradually the church officers have awakened to the value of the plan. Classes volunteer to canvass sections of the town, distribute door-hangers, and visit those who may be interested in the meetings of the church.

What Can Our Class Do for Our Nation?

Boys are giving up positions, incomes, ease and pleasure to go into training that is hard, to fight and die for native land! What shall we stay-at-homes do to be worthy of a place beside them? As good citizens, we will pay our taxes, obey the laws, conserve fuel and food, help in all patriotic causes. What more can we do as Christians and members of the Sunday school?

We can study home missions and learn where to help. Never was there such a chance to Americanize and Christianize the foreigner. No more are coming, and those here are aroused to patriotism and sacrifice for America. They are fellow sufferers with us in the discomforts of war times and in separation from their sons and in frequent sorrows. Help your nation by increasing its solidarity. Be cordial to the immigrant. Teach him English. And above all, be brotherly. Differences are forgotten as we labor or fight side by side.

Study the needs of America's working multitudes. Once more let me say it, your church or school will be shirking a duty if you do not get a copy of the new Home Missions Book on America's toilers, and have a class for its study. It is "The Gospel for a Working World," by Harry F. Ward, and a copy costs 45 cents, postpaid from the Missionary Education Movement, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City. If you are teaching younger children, set aside a few minutes each Sunday for a chapter from "Jack of All Trades," by Margaret Applegarth. This costs 30 cents, postpaid, from same publishers.

One of the boys' classes in our church sends carefully selected papers and magazines to fourscore soldiers from our town. We pass on all our Christian Heralds and church papers and bulletins, as well as the local news. The deacons of this church pay for the mailing, counting it a spiritual ministry. Letters are written by others to men whose names are supplied by the pastor, and in every letter God is mentioned and the Bible quoted or referred to. Several boys will join the church on profession of faith when they come back home!

What Can Our Class Do to Help the World?

Perhaps one of us will go forth as an accredited missionary to one of earth's neediest places. Keep holding this possibility before your group constantly and it will bear fruit in life. The rest can at least know about the progress of the Kingdom, and pray and give. We ought to know of the great work of undermanned hospitals, schools and churches. We ought to understand the strain, so terrific just now, and the gallant efforts of those who represent us. We ought to take at least our denominational missionary magazine and read in class some of the "wants" of the mission stations in the way of equipment and supplies. What a pleasure for a class of young Christians to respond to some appeal from India or China! Of course, many schools or classes have "adopted" some missionary or school and exchange letters and snapshots, and keep in close contact with the progress of one corner of the far-off work of the Kingdom. It is far more interesting to furnish a needed blackboard in a school on the Congo, than to send in five dollars to the general fund of the missionary society. Besides, it enables children to visualize the work being done.

Only God knows how far Christian influence reaches. Its testimony is beyond that of words or deeds. "Even so let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven."

"I Would Not Part with it for $10,000"

You may say, "I wish I were a boy again"; but your neighbor turns back the pages of his memory, and says, "The Lord forbid!"

stirrings here and there down farther where the people were more numerous. "Why not—go with her!" Beldren asked himself. If necessary he would spend his one talent of loyalty for his lady.

"Come!" said Dundee, in final appeal. Again he made that compelling gesture, his right hand, held high, beckoning.

Big Bill Ledyard, the King of the Shillibers, glanced at his side, where the young man and woman were. Just his luck. A honeymoon couple, holding hands, right at his elbow! Bill's face was bland, guileless. By some magic he settled his old coat and vest until they exuded tried respectability. His old derby hat, at just the right angle, suggested the farmer in town to see the sights. He smiled at the two, Mona and Jim, exerting to the full the telepathy of his most wonderful clowning, for a single tense and perfect heartbeat, turning his great powers of attraction unwittingly to the Best Uses. Over him fell the shimmer of sheer, mystic allurements. He extended his hand to the girl in that moment of ultimate decision.

"Let's go an' see what it's like," Big Bill said, putting forth his last iota of magnetism. Again he was the King of the Shillibers, supreme in his power to pull the crowds after him!

THE two, nothing doubting that here was another soul like themselves, almost persuaded, eager to go forward, yet afraid of being first, yielded. And together, the old shill, his heart pumping out almost the last bit of its strength against the obstruction of rapidly solidifying lungs, stimulated yet torn with fever, his brain wrapped in its mists, through which he was seeing everything in distorted form and sequence, the gangster and his girl, the sick of body-leading the sick of soul, the one needing a physician, the two The Physician, went together down the sawdust trail, the first fruits of many and many for that meeting. Truly the harvest was great! At the platform's edge Dundee, his eyes shining, received them, Big Bill first, to whom he gave his hand heartily, and then to the others in turn.

Dundee, his hand firmly gripped in the steel-muscled one of Beldren, felt himself drawn forward. The young man wanted to whisper—something the converts sometimes did. Billy bent a willing ear to hear:

"If we stay till after the meeting's over, will you take us back o' the platform there an' marry us? I been thinking o' doin' it a long time now. She's a good girl. I ought to—"

"Surely," said Dundee, with his deep knowledge of human nature.

Back from the crowd the two stood, waiting. The slowly moving line of converts came forward in orderly array, each face alight with joy and peace.

"Oh, Jim!" said Mona, "I heard what you said to Mr. Dundee. I thank you for making it so I can go to bid my mother good-by for the last time with you; and clean, Jim, clean, both of us—now."

"Cheese th' thanks, Mona. You been my friend. A man that won't stick to his friends—well, he's no good."

"But where's that old man that came down with us?"

They glanced about. The old farmer of the kindly smile and friendly gesture had gone. But over their shoulder, forcing his way through the final eddies of the converted throngs, was a man in uniform.

"It's the hospital orderly, Jim," Mona said.

THEY worked their way forward to meet him, informed of the fatal truth he bore in his message by the glance of commiseration he gave to Lightweight Jimmy, his sporting-world luminary.

"Hurry, Miss an' Junmie," the orderly said. "You'll be just in time. She's had a bad sinkin' spell, and the nurse said to come on th' jump."

"Hurry! do, Jim!" Mona panted.

They started for the entrance. Dundee called after them, his acute eyes having kept track of them. In such cases he always made sure of the depth of the first impression made on the convert. He vaulted from the platform with vigor, thereby scandalizing a couple of precisians whom he almost overtook in his rush.

"Her mother's dyin' in th' horspittle over there," said Jim, waving his hand. "We've got to go over an'—"

"Let me go to her, too—with you," said Dundee, striding forward, taking the lead.

"Please do," said Mona.

A little later, over the hospital bed, Mona and Jim joined hands. Billy Dundee, Bible in hand, read to them the mystic words of the service. The dying woman, hearing the responses duly made, the hallowed phrases, smiled up wanly at them, and that smile on her lips was the last expression of a life that might have been much better, and, indeed, much worse, even as the lives of most of us.

JUST before midnight, among the seats at the far end of the great place, the cleaners, making the tabernacle ready for the services of the new week, came upon a big, bony, crumpled body. One of the helpers, after the dead clay had been pulled into decent pose on the rough boards, said:

"That's the old farmer that led the big march down the sawdust trail last night. I saw him, and Mr. Dundee was anxious to find him, to thank him personally for his work. Poor old chap; he's seen his last springtime!"

Conservation for Victory

ELMER E. HUBBARD, an American missionary in Cardenas, Cuba, writes enclosing a form of pledge "with the hope that it may be the humble means, in your hands and others, of developing an offensive in which we know you are deeply interested."

"Our first thought," he writes, "was to have a thousand or more of the pledges printed and sent out, in sets of ten, to one hundred prominent citizens, including the governors of all the states and the presidents of some of the state universities or the state superintendents of public instruction, to be thus distributed over the country, with the suggestion that each citizen who receives and signs the pledge repeat the effort to another thousand, and so on until the whole nation is reached. But you in the homeland can devise the best ways and means. Perhaps you could put into the hands of every pastor as many pledges as he could use in his church or community. Or you could put a pledge into the hands of every one of your readers." The pledge is given below:

"Victory for the Allies is sure, because our cause is just. Victory may come soon, or it may come late and at an awful cost. How soon or how late depends upon you and me. Human might matched against human might may hold out long. Human might matched against Omnipotence must soon give in. In God we trust, and the strength of our trust is in proportion to our conformity to him. If our lives are clean and straight and square they become channels of Omnipotence to our community and to our nation. If our corporate life in its various forms and manifestations is clean and straight and square, the strength of the people is the strength of God. To help to prevent the prolonged horrors of war, I pledge myself to clean up, straighten up and square up at home. And may God help me."

Here follow the name, the address and the date.

Questions and Answers

A. B. D., Md. I have just read "The Church that Made Good," by B. F. F., and as you invite anyone interested in the subject to write you, I am taking this opportunity to ask your advice. I have been a minister of the Methodist Protestant Church for ten years. I am thirty-eight and have "made good." Recently I have become deeply interested in church unity. It seems to me that a united Church is the only one that will ever save the world. I love my denomination. It is one of nearly 200 sects in America that are helping to keep Christ's flock from becoming "one, as he and the Father are one." I had almost decided to cast my lot with the only body of Christians that seek the union of all followers of Christ. What should I do? Can I best serve him by going with the other church, or by staying where I am and trying to work along the lines that B. F. F. worked? Changing from one denomination to another, we should think, would not help you. However excellent it might be in some respects, you would be liable to encounter the same or similar disappointments. We would advise you to write to the secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City, and get all the available literature on the subject, and take counsel of experience. You may be able to serve the cause of church unity better where you are than anywhere else.

C. E. G., Lamar, Mo. "I beg of you, as a 'Watchman on the walls of Zion,' to cease not impressing this great truth on your thousands of readers, that our people must turn to God. I am persuaded beyond a doubt that when we, as a nation, 'seek first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness,' our troubles will soon be over."

Geo. B. S., Newport, R. I., writes: "A veteran of the Civil War, now seventy-nine years old, has volunteered his entire time for general service to the Naval Hospital in this city as a patriotic privilege, to help carry the war to a successful end. He has been a subscriber of the Christian Herald for many years, and his example may stimulate some to help in some other way." Our aged friend shows true American spirit, and his patriotism should be an inspiration to young and old. We do not doubt that a very large proportion of our readers are already doing their "bit" to help win the war.

G. A. F., Washington, D. C. In reply to the invitation opening the article "The Church that Made Good" on page 892 of the Christian Herald, I give these facts: M—, Wyoming County, Pennsylvania, is a small country village—no mines, mills or factories, just a farming community. The farmers are of American stock. There are three churches—Methodist, Presbyterian and Baptist—named perhaps in the order of their strength, but all jealous and struggling. There should be but one. I was somewhat in touch with conditions there until a couple of years ago. Now I am three hundred miles from there. Can I be of further service?

Probably the best way for you to help them would be to send them the article in question. It has a broad appeal. It can offend no one and it may do much good.

W. H. W., York, Pa. Your article in the issue of July 31 on Noonday Prayer interested me from the fact of its importance. I have complied with the request daily from the time it was suggested, with the assurance that it will be answered in God's own time. I am an 85-year-old subscriber.

R. S. A., Delta, Colo. 1. According to the latest article by Dr. Carroll, published in the Christian Herald several months ago, there are 167 religious denominations in the United States. 2. Life is a precious gift from God and it is our duty to accept it as such and to live it out to the end, making the best use of it, to his glory and the good of our fellow men. It is a sin to shorten life or to throw it away. Job, when tempted to end all his sufferings by suicide, replied: "All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come" (Job 14:14). Paul, when the Philippian jailer was about to kill himself, cried out, "Do thyself no harm" (Acts 16:28). There is no passage in Scripture which shows that we have a right to shorten or terminate our existence. Under human law in all civilized countries suicide is a crime, and ecclesiastical law in early days repudiated the suicide and denied him Christian burial.

Geo. W. A. Smith, Ansonville, N. C. Will you please give me the author of the child's evening and morning prayer; and when its use began? I have known some children to object very seriously, and even to absolutely decline to repeat the third line, "If I should die before I wake." What do you think of this as a substitute?

Evening

Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep
And give my body rest;
Guard me through the coming night,
Wake me safe with morning light
And be my daily quest.
This quest I make
For Jesus sake,
Who when I pray
Taught me to say,
Our Father who art in heaven, etc.,

Morning

Now I wake and see the light,
'Tis God has kept me through the night
And given me refreshing sleep;
To him I lift my heart and pray
That he will guide me through the day,
And help me his good sheaves to reap.
This quest I make
For Jesus sake,
Who when I pray
Taught me to say,
Our Father who art in heaven, etc.

The "Child's Prayer" has been attributed to various authors, but its origin is not positively known. It is very old, however. Our correspondent's variant on the prayer will please many readers and interest all.

J. V. P., Long Beach, Calif. Our government is taking the best care of our soldiers, as to morals, dietary and general well-being. Whatever latitude is allowed is an emergency measure. We must not let small things interfere with our appreciation of all the good that has been done in their behalf.

A Constant Reader. Lev. 20:21 is often quoted as forbidding the marriage of a woman with her deceased husband's brother or that of a man with his deceased wife's sister. There are differences of opinion on the subject. Some countries and some of our states forbid such marriages by statute.

M. M. V., Cupola, Pa. Are you not going a little bit too far? If we were to investigate everything in the same spirit as you would do, there would be no peace left to us. Works of necessity—and feeding people is a necessity—have always been permitted on the Sabbath. Even Christ and his disciples took grain on the Sabbath. If you want to be consistent and keep the Sabbath strictly holy, you are to be admired and praised; but let us be tolerant and remember that there are many who may be unable, from very force of circumstances, to observe it as they would wish.

Mrs. E. B. McN., Letts, Iowa. The Christian Herald is interdenominational. It belongs to the entire Christian church that believes, as it does, in a risen Lord who guides his Church and will call it to its proper final home and inheritance. We deeply regret church dissensions and differences of opinion, but firmly believe that the time is coming when, with one Master, there will be in reality and practice but one great body of faithful believers.

O. C. C., Millstadt, Ill. The whole matter is controversial. Until some better reasons are forthcoming than have been presented, Christians will continue to believe that Matthew, Mark, Luke and John wrote the Gospels. Acts was written by Luke, the next thirteen epistles by Paul. The writer of Hebrews is unknown, but the epistle is now generally credited to Apollos. The author of James was not James the Apostle, but James the brother of our Lord. The Epistles of Peter, especially the second, have been the subject of dispute, but we can see no valid reason for doubting that Peter wrote them. So with the Epistles of John and Jude. Revelation differs so completely in style from the Gospel of John that critics aver that the two books could not have been written by the same man.

S. E. O., Reserve, Kan. Nothing is said in Scripture to tell us why Saul's name was changed to Paul. It was common for Jews to bear two names, the one their own, the other taken from some country or people with which they had been connected. Thus, Saul among the Jews would be Paulus among the Gentiles. The sacred historian, wishing to mark the point of transition from darkness to light in Paul's life, emphasized the change of name, calling him Saul first, and Paul afterward.

Mrs. C. A. L., Pomona, Calif., In Mr. Maynard Owen Williams's articles in the Christian Herald, which give much available information concerning Russia, you will probably find what you want.

Episcopalian. What reason is there for the symbols under which the four Evangelists are typified in some of the churches?

Dean Farrar has the following explanation: The man or angel representing Matthew is used because his Gospel brings out Christ's humanity; the lion of Mark as an emblem of strength; the ox of Luke because of his dwelling on the priestly and mediatorial aspect of Christ, the ox being the emblem of sacrifice; and the eagle of John because he soars to heaven and represents the divine character of Christ.

A Friend in New York has sent us a letter from Foochow, China, which reveals how the great war is regarded by the poets in that distant land. Mr. W. S. Pakenham Walsh of Trinity College, Foochow, has issued a book of "Chants in War," being a collection of poems dedicated to friends at the front. One of the poems tells of the men in the Allied armies and their high ideals—how they fight on—

"Till they see the new day breaking
Through the battle and the gloom;
For the cannons won't stop roaring,
And the banners won't be furled,
Till the Superman is melted
In the cauldron of the world."

Another poem describes the entry of America into the war:

"Oh how holy was that hour,
When she rose in all her power,
And her answer pealed like music o'er the main;
When Britannia saw her come,
To the dear old island home,
And the hands that long were sundered met Again."

"The Road to Calais," "Hope," "Consolation," "Mons" and "Australia" are a few of the many themes treated by the writer.

Palestine and its people are in the thoughts of many in these days of reviving hope for ancient Israel. Mr. Elmer E. Hubbard of the Industrial Homes, Cardenas, Cuba, writes: "I have just received a $50 Liberty Bond and the question has come: What shall I do with it? I might keep it in the house, and it might be stolen, or burned, or in some way lost. I might put it in a safety vault; but I can't see what good it would do there. So I have decided to send it to you to supplement the $200 that we sent some months ago for some of the homeless children of Palestine. If that money was put to good use it must be nearly all used now. I know that the Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee made arrangements by which the Liberty Bonds could bring their full face value for the Armenians. I hope this bond will thus be worth the full value for our children; if not, please let me know how much it lacks, for I want them to have the $50."

What tenement mothers think of Mont-Lawn and of the impressions it leaves with the children is told in letters that come to the Home. The following, from a grateful mother, is typical of others:

"DEAR TEACHER: Just a few lines to say William Olsen, also his brother Edward, arrived safe home last Friday, the 14th, and he has never given me a minute's rest since he came home till I would write to you. He is standing by waiting to mail it, so he will be sure you will get it. Well, they looked so well when they came home after being away for only ten days that I was surprised to see them. Then they told me of all the good things they had to eat, the good times they had, and the kindness. William cried all day, Friday, to get back; also when he went to bed at night he cried himself to sleep, saying, 'I want to go back where I came from,' and about his kind teacher. Now I have a busy time with five children, but I just had to sit down and write to you, when I saw the boys look so well for such a short time. I am not very strong myself, and I said it is too bad they don't take the poor mothers. How much good it would do them; but William says: 'You can't go; you are not a child.' As they speak of it, it must be very nice up there. I did like to hear all the good they had learned, both games and prayers. I will close, thanking you for your goodness and kindness to my children, William, Edward, Helen.

"TEMPLE SERIES OF BIBLE CHARACTERS AND SCRIPTURE HANDBOOKS"

THE Christian Herald recently purchased all the copies remaining in this country of the "Temple Series of Bible Characters and Scripture Handbooks."

These exceedingly attractive booklets were printed in London, England, a large edition being imported to sell here. This edition has been exhausted with the exception of the copies which we have obtained and it will not be possible to import any more of them.

These booklets are coat-pocket size and uniform in binding. There are eleven volumes in the series several being shown here. Each volume deals authoritatively with a separate subject by a different author of distinction in his special field.

In the first group of five, one deals with the Story of Abraham and the Patriarchal Age; another with the Story of Joseph and the Land of Egypt; the third with Joshua and the Palestinian Conquest, which was to the Jewish people as great a historical turning-point as was the Conquest of Britain by William the Norman; the fourth deals with the decline of the Patriarchal order and the rise of the Hebrew Monarchy under Saul; and the fifth with the full development of Israel and Judah under the "Hero King," David. These five volumes form a progressive, chronological story of the rise of the Hebrew race.

Another group of three volumes deals with the New Testament. The first gives the foundation of Christianity and the work and lives of the Twelve Apostles; the second gives the work and life of Paul, the "Light to the Gentiles"; and the third is a record of the early Christian martyrdoms and persecutions, showing how, through blood and suffering, they preserved the faith which began in a little church in Jerusalem, with 120 followers, and now has grown to 564,000,000 Christians throughout the world.

In addition to the eight volumes named, there are three miscellaneous titles.

Here Are the Eleven Titles

1. Abraham and the Patriarchal Age.
2. Joshua and the Palestinian Conquest.
3. Saul and the Rise of the Hebrew Monarchy.
4. David, the Hero King of Israel.
5. St. Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles.
6. The Early Christian Martyrs and Their Persecutions.
7. Joseph and the land of Egypt.
8. The Twelve Apostles.
9. The Post-Exilic Prophets.
10. The Age of Daniel and the Exile.
11. The Religions of India—Brahmanism and Buddhism.

ONLY A FEW COPIES LEFT PICTORIAL LIFE OF CHRIST

EIGHTY magnificent sculptural illustrations by the famous Italian master-sculptor, Domenico Mastroianni, who has "imbibed the very spirit of the Holy Land." In his scenes, every figure stands out with vivid distinctness and almost startling clearness of detail. The characters, postures, and surroundings are those of Nazareth and Jerusalem. We see the Saviour himself—a commanding figure of royal dignity blended with divine pity, yet withal intensely human—"in all things as we are."

In simple, attractive language, the story of the life of Jesus is told by the Rev. Ira S. Dodd, who has adhered faithfully to the narrative in the Gospels.

We will send a copy of "The Pictorial Life of Christ," postpaid, together with $250 the Christian Herald for one year, for

Young People's Topics for Sept. 15

Did I Ever Have a Direct Answer to Prayer?

Epworth League Topic. Matt. 21:22; John 14:13, 14; 15:7; James 4:3

THERE is a great deal of misconception regarding the answering of prayer. Some people take the promise, "Whatsoever things ye shall ask," to mean that Heaven has become a sure source of supply to all our desires for temporal things, and for personal ambitions, but seem to forget that in the Bible it is said "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and all these things shall be added unto you." They forget also the verse in the reference in which it says: "If ye abide in me, ye shall ask what ye will," while in another verse James suggests that there is a danger that the prayer may have been amiss. If we pray in Christ's name, we must pray in his spirit, which was "Not my will but thine." The Scriptures contain many evidences of answered prayer. King Hezekiah saved Jerusalem and gained an extension of years as the result of prayer. Jacob prayed, and the heavens were opened and a ladder was let down from above. Jacob's wrestle with the angel was a form of prayer, for he said "I will not let thee go except thou bless me." If we, like Jacob, hold ourselves in the presence of God with like persistence, there will be no doubt in our minds regarding the answer, for the blessing is sure. If we ask for power because the exercise of power gratifies our human desire; if we ask for things merely for the selfish reason of personal desire for possession, we may expect a negative answer to our prayer. We must not forget that to some prayers God answers "no." This topic might well be made the basis of an inspiring, spiritual, and vitally profitable experience meeting, for it is highly probable that among those present will be many whose prayers have been definitely answered, and one certain testimony is worth hours of discussion. We would suggest that the leader use as little time as possible in presenting the topic, and that he arrange in advance for the giving of at least half a dozen testimonies, asking the older members of the church to come for that purpose.

The Saloon Power and How to Overthrow It

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Heb. 2:1-17

YOU might almost answer this question by saying: "Look about you." The saloon power is fast being driven from its last intrenchments, for the politicians, awake at last to the temper of the people, have turned against their former ally and listen coldly to those to whose words they once paid close attention. The time has passed when the brewers or distillers could make or break a politician's reputation. Shorn of their political friendships, the liquor interests are at bay behind a few influential newspapers. The Anti-Saloon League, building on the public sentiment developed by the W. C. T. U., the Prohibition party and temperance workers generally, has them on the run, and it won't be long until the adoption of the Federal Prohibition Amendment will send the whole business to oblivion. The Anti-Saloon League found the way to overthrow the saloon some years ago, and it has been following it persistently. The first step was the earnest co-operation of Christian people. With this power at their back, they were able to show the legislators a most excellent reason for respectful attention. Where liquor was well entrenched, they fought for local option, educated the voters and voted the saloon out county by county. This was a war of attrition. Where public sentiment was ready for it, they drove at once for full prohibition. When enough counties in the state were thoroughly dry by local option, the guns were brought up for the great assault that should clean up the state. Gradually the time approached when the nation could be made a unit. The states are now voting on the amendment that will wind up the whole rotten business. The saloon power, based on appetite and built on human weakness and cupidity, is being overthrown by the united co-operation of Christians of all denominations as a measure of practical evangelism which will bless the nation. If your state has not already ratified the national prohibition amendment, the obvious thing for your society to do just now is to enter whole-heartedly into the fight for ratification.

"For God and Country"

THE makers of hymn-books in recent years have compiled excellent collections of hymns dealing with the Heavenly Hope and with the peace and rest elements of our faith. But when America went to war, and we sought for stirring hymns in keeping with the times, most of our collections fell short. Recognizing this situation the Presbyterian Board of Publication has compiled a little pamphlet of hymns for use in war times entitled "For God and Country." The pamphlet contains thirty-five hymns, including "The Star-Spangled Banner," the "Battle Hymn of the Republic," Kipling's "Recessional," "Onward, Christian Soldiers," and others, new and old, but all good, and all suitable for patriotic meetings, either in the church or elsewhere. There are also three selections of Psalms suitable for use with the collection of hymns. The pamphlet is sold for 10 cents each, and is cheaper by the 100.

REV. A. E. BISHOP of the Central American Mission, Guatemala, writes to the Christian Herald in a recent letter: "I am again reminded of the faithfulness of God by the receipt of a letter from Judge Scott containing your valued offering of $33 for the Lord's work in this needy land. We count you as real fellow laborers. For some days we have not felt a single earthquake shock, and the reconstruction of the mission building, as well as the spiritual work of our mission, goes on with no little degree of satisfaction. We are now holding weekly in this city some thirty meetings, comprising evangelistic teaching and classes for children and women. A few days ago a native Christian farmer, living some fifteen miles from the capital, sent me 1,000 pesos with a note, saying that it was for use exclusively in the reconstruction of the mission building. This morning one of the Christian laborers working on the building handed me a little note containing the voluntary offering of thirteen believers, amounting to 838 pesos, a large part being contributed by believers working on the building—also for reconstruction work exclusively. We appreciate these offerings and know something of the sacrifices that these native Christians have made in order to be able to contribute so liberally."

Questions and Answers

AG. McC., Altoona, Pa. When we pray in faith, in Jesus' name and according to the divine will, there is nothing we may not ask. We should not ask for a life exempt from labor, from self-denial, from misunderstanding, nor even from the Cross, for how could we ask for such things in his name? He tells us that whatsoever we shall ask in his name will be given to us, and he also tells us to seek first the things of the Kingdom, and all the rest (the material needs of life) will be added to us. In his name we can ask with assurance for pardon; to be strengthened in temptation and to be kept from falling, and to be restored when, through human weakness, we do fall; and we can also ask for the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit in our lives. But in asking we must have the faith to lay hold, and when we pray with this faith, we do not pray amiss. Perhaps what you so persistently ask he sees in his wisdom would not be for the best. Would you want it, nevertheless?

Reader, Hackettstown, N. J. There are many cases like that you mention, where an unbelieving life-partner makes life almost unbearable for the believing one. Yet we can never foresee when patience and restraint, that are now found so difficult to exercise, may be rewarded by the melting of the heart that has seemed so hard, but which comes at last to recognition and admiration for the Christian virtues which the other has practiced with patience and hope.

J. B. Phillips, pastor of the Baptist Tabernacle, Chattanooga, Tenn., sends this interesting account of a novel utilization of Thrift Stamps: He writes: "Just before our Bible conference last fall, we built a number of new Sunday school rooms and overhauled our church throughout, in order to have everything neat for the Bible conference. As the conference was coming on, our deacons decided not to raise the money to pay for this work then, but to make a note for $3,000 for twelve months. A few weeks ago I suggested that, instead of raising the money and paying off the debt, we put it into Thrift Stamps, so the government could handle the cash, and we arranged with the bank to carry the note until the Thrift Stamps mature, with our paying $210 per year interest. The deacons recommended this plan, the church fell into line. We were just eight days in the drive, as it started on Sunday the 7th and closed on Sunday night the 14th. Our people are very happy, and we are all looking forward with great pleasure to our coming Bible conference, which convenes October 6 and runs through the 27th." In the "drive," $2,511 was raised in Thrift Stamps, to which the church added $500 in government bonds, being "over the top" and more than sufficient to meet the debt.

J. T. F. writes: "I believe that Christian people of the allied nations, without formal action by civil or ecclesiastical authority, ought to pray in their own homes and churches, not merely that the Kaiser may be conquered in battle and that he may be tumbled from his throne of autocratic power, but we ought to ask God on bended knee for something else, which no amount of fighting can bring to pass, and that something is that the Kaiser may have a 'broken and contrite spirit,' that he may be convinced of the enormity of his sin, and cry to God for mercy and confess his sin before the world. If any man in the world, past or present, has reason to smite on his breast and cry: 'God be merciful to me a sinner,' it is William II. If any man in history has reason to cry out, as Job did when his eyes were opened: 'I abhor myself in dust and ashes,' it is the head of the Central Powers. He will be beaten in battle; he will be dethroned without doubt; but the spiritual result will be nil, if these are the only fruitage. How can this man be brought to this conviction of sin? I believe in no other way than by prayer. If the Christian people of the Entente Allies will confess and sincerely make bare before God their own national and private sins, praying each day in their own homes, and praying in faith that the Holy Spirit would convict the Kaiser of his sins, and open his eyes to see what the burden of them is, then I believe we would see a spectacle such as the world never saw before, and from that moment there would be some hope of bringing the kingdom of Christ into men's hearts—some hope of a lasting Christian brotherhood."

J. E. McB., Antrim, Ohio. In Mal. 3:5, the prophet is warning against indulgence in vice, and especially against committing the grosser sins, and is telling his hearers that God is quick to punish those who so offend. In 1 Tim. 1:8, the apostle Paul expresses the thought that Christians who have received the divine forgiveness are to feel that the law has been satisfied, and they are no longer under its condemnation. To those who backslide or who continue in their sinful way, however, the law is still a terrible and active reality.

Mrs. A. D. McC., McConnellsville, Ohio. There is a bill before Congress to pension persons who have reached a certain age, but this bill has not yet been passed, and it is impossible to state when Congress will consider it, as war measures are being given first place on account of their urgency.

Mrs. M. W. Raphine, Va. Clerks, stenographers, and typists are especially needed to fill many more positions in all branches of war work in Washington. The salaries for such positions begin with $1,100, with an increase to $1,200 in three months, if services are satisfactory. Write to the Civil Service Commission, 1724 F Street, N. W., Washington, D. C., where you can obtain full details and application blanks for any kind of a government position.

Rev. John C. R., Lindley, N. Y. A candidate for appointment as chaplain in the army must be a regularly ordained minister of some religious denomination, and recommended by some authorized ecclesiastical body. He must be under forty years of age, and able to pass satisfactorily a mental, moral and physical examination. Application blanks may be obtained from the Adjutant General, War Department, Washington, D. C.

F. K., Batesville, Ark. For information regarding the adoption of a French orphan you should communicate with the Fatherless Children of France Branch, 655 Fifth Avenue, New York City. The French Legation say that they had not intended to have the Belgian or the French orphans brought to the United States any more than necessary, as they wish to keep the children in their own countries.

C. N., Staunton, Va. Canteen work in the United States means volunteer work in railroad stations and clubs for soldiers and sailors, under the auspices of the American Red Cross, the National League for Woman's Service, and other organizations. Abroad, canteen work is conducted by the Y. M. C. A. and the Red Cross. Y. M. C. A. candidates must be between the ages of thirty and forty-five years. Under no circumstances will any one under twenty-six years of age be considered. The canteen work both home and abroad is purely voluntary, and no expense or salary will be paid. For full particulars write to the War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A., 124 East Twenty-sixth Street, New York. Red Cross candidates must also be able to speak French well, and sign a contract for a minimum term of six months' service. Further, very few women are being sent abroad, unless specially qualified for the service they desire to do. Red Cross applications should be made to the Personnel Bureau of the Red Cross, Fourth Avenue and Eighteenth Street, New York.

J. E. B., Pittsburg, Pa. The following are rules for the display of the American flag as used by government buildings and military posts and reservations: The flag out of doors should always fly to the breeze. The flag, whenever possible, should be flown from a staff or mast, but should not be fastened to the side of a building, platform or scaffolding. The flag should never be hoisted before sunrise, nor allowed to remain up after sunset. When the national flag is flown with other State or national flags, it should always be on the right, or above the others. When the flag is hung from a window or similar place without the use of a pole, the blue field should be in the upper left-hand corner. When the flag is hung between two buildings, on streets running east and west, the union should fly to the north, and on streets running north and south the union should fly to the east. Indoors, the flag may be draped, but should never be placed below a person sitting. The flag should never be allowed to touch the ground.

J. W. H., Faber, Va. An order went into effect on June 10, allowing an officer or a soldier, who has a signed furlough by his commanding officer, the privilege of riding on the railroads to his destination for one cent per mile. This furlough may be presented and honored at any railroad office from which and to which points the person is going.

M. E. R., Foley, Mo. A mirage is an optical illusion due to the rays of light, from the objects apparently seen, being bent in passing through layers of air of different densities. The rays are refracted by the water vapor in the air as by a prism. Objects which are beyond the horizon, and, therefore, out of sight, become visible through the curving of the light rays. To the eye of the observer the object appears to lie in the direction of the last refraction of light, thus making a house, a barn, a windmill or a field appear suspended in the sky. The blue sky, showing below, gives the effect of a great lake on the shore of which the buildings stand. Such an appearance of water has, in the days of the trail, led many a famished traveler astray.

M. M., Lake George, N. Y. Cumulative interest differs from compound interest in that the yearly accretions of interest do not themselves draw interest: $100 at 6 per cent. cumulative interest will equal in ten years $100 plus ten times $6, or $160, while at 6 per cent. compound interest the yearly additions will be $6.00, $6.36, $6.74, $7.15, $7.58, $8.03, $8.51, $9.02, $9.56 and $10.14, making a total in ten years of $179.09.

Reader, Ohio. There are many scientific speculations as to the duration of the five great geological periods; but as each period is supposed to have lasted for a long succession of centuries, there can be no accurate basis for an agreement even as to the approximate age of the globe. At the same time, scientists do not hesitate to declare their belief that hundreds of thousands of years may have elapsed since the period which saw the dawn of animal life in the geological world.

L. F. L., Maxwell, Ont. In Matt. 19:17, the Revised Version translates the passage: "Why askest thou me concerning that which is good? One there is who is good." The young man approached Jesus in a self-righteous spirit, claiming to have kept all the commandments since his youth. Jesus therefore reminds him that God, who can read his heart, is perfect, and requires a high standard of believers, and not self-righteousness.

R. H., Brooklyn, N. Y. You know the conditions of salvation and can judge for yourself whether you have fulfilled them. Christ said: "My sheep hear my voice and they follow me." Try earnestly to follow Christ and to be like him, kind and patient, gentle and sinless. Study his character as described in the Gospels, and make him your example. Pray that you may have his spirit and try to get your friend and companion to love him and trust him. You may be sure that God will keep his promise.

F. H. Jordan, Minn. The Leviathan, formerly the Vatterland, one of the largest ships ever built, was originally intended to carry 5,000 passengers, but has since carried 11,000 troops; the Justicia, lately sunk, could carry 5,000.

J. A. Ford, Plain Dealing, La., can remember his father singing a song concerning Napoleon on St. Helena, some of the words of which were something like this:

"Napoleon is gone from war;
No more can cannons roar
Awake him on the isle of St. Helena."

Can any of our readers supply the words of this old song?

J. M., Locust Ridge, La. Picardy was one of the old feudal provinces of France, and its territory is now comprised in the departments of Somme, Oise, Pas de Calais, and Aisne. The name is still unofficially applied to that part of France, which borders on the English Channel, and contains the cities of Amiens, Beauvais, Calais, Boulogne, Arras, Soissons and Laon. The fighting in the present war has been largely in Picardy, which was a portion of that part of ancient Gaul inhabited by the Belgians, who were considered by the Romans the bravest of the Gauls. The city of Amiens is noted for its cathedral, one of the most magnificent in Europe, founded in 1220. It is 470 feet in length, with a transept 213 feet across. The Peace of Amiens between England and France was concluded March 27, 1802.

Subscriber, Allentown, Pa., writes: "From pulpit and press we hear much about the causes of the war, and prophecy relating to it, and little about prayer. Our God is as powerful today as in the past, and if we as a nation humble ourselves before him, and trust implicitly in him, will he not honor that trust, and give us victory and give it speedily? Plead with the Christians of America to pray without ceasing to this end. If God would save Sodom and Gomorrah for the sake of ten righteous, will he not give us peace if all the righteous of this nation plead with him for it? For we all agree that our cause is just, and we are fighting on the Lord's side."

Words Suggested by a Reader of the Christian Herald

TAPS

1 God of Might! Guard our boys: God of Peace! God of Life! Save them all: God of Love! Keep each one, Ev-er- more.

2 God of Love, friends and home! God of Peace! God of Life! Keep them all: God of Love! Bless each one, Ev-er- more

THE above has been adapted from a suggestion which appeared in the Christian Herald. The first line is intended to be sung as a prayer by the Sunday school for the boys who are in the Army—the second line is a prayer by the soldier for the loved ones at home. The call is "Taps," the go-to-sleep call, the last bugle note heard at night. It must be sung very slowly—the slower the better. This was the first used among the soldiers of Camp Wadsworth, and after some alteration and the addition of the second line, is being effectively sung at the Presbyterian Sunday school in Anchorage, Ky.

Jerusalem a City of Refugees

By MAJOR THEODORE WATERS, of the Christian Herald and American Red Cross

THIS morning I visited the Tower of David. It lies just inside the Jaffa Gate and forms part of the wall of the city. The present wall is the third that has been erected. The first wall is traditionally that erected in the time of David. The second wall, built during the Roman period, is the wall of the time of Christ. The present wall was erected by Sulaiman the Magnificent, centuries later. So in somewhat the same manner the Tower of David has had its periods. It is asserted here positively that the lower part was of David's time, but that the upper parts were added as the centuries rolled on. How they could have manipulated such large pieces of rock in those early days is a mystery akin to that of the Pyramids. The great moat surrounding this castle is partly filled up; but it must have been a most effective defense in its day. And the great pile must also have proved a strong bastille for those who offended the kings. But now all is changed and nothing is left but the very rocks themselves. Yet you can walk through the old stone rooms, mounting floor upon floor until you stand far above the city. You may even mount up the stairs of the minaret which surmounts the pile and gaze for miles over the surrounding landscape. But if you take this journey today, you will be surprised at the occupants of the castle. No longer the kings and the feastings. No longer the warriors hooting their arrows through the narrow slitted windows. The Tower of David today is filled with a crowd of more or less miserable wretches. Arabs who come from far along the Jordan. Men who wear long black robes and white head-coverings decorated with two black cords. Women whose lips have been atoned. People whose one purpose in life seems to be to do nothing but smoke cigarettes and rear large numbers of children, who squabble with one another and run all over the place. And over all, the inevitable dirt! These people are on rations, fed to them by the military authorities, who have done everything possible to make their lot as pleasant as it could be made for a nomadic people cooped up in a city. But contrast the situation with that which existed when his castle was young. What a difference! Even so, it is better that it should at last come to be a haven of refuge even for such benighted heathens as now occupy it, than be a place of reveling for kings and their concubines, or a place of long-drawn-out punishment for poor captives, for whom it was a torture chamber, without chance of escape.

"COME along and see the fellaheen," said Dr. Harry C. Hurd, one of our physicians, who, from the very first, has been working among the refugees. "You will find them interesting."

Hurd is the type of the genial physician whose one object in life seems to be the acquisition of a greater knowledge of the science of curing disease and its application with a broad sympathy among the suffering people. We climbed into a motor accompanied by Marcus. Marcus, by the way, is one of the characters of the Unit. He is more than that; he is an institution, is Marcus—a product of the peculiar stress through which Jerusalem has passed. He says he is fourteen years old. But he looks much younger and acts much older. He can read and write English, Russian, French, and Arabic, and he can speak but not write German. He has passed through all the régimes, Turkish, German and English, and he has taken toll of each in the acquiring of languages and backsheesh. Yet, strangely enough, he is both industrious and honest, and is the sole support of his widowed mother. If you would know what he looks like, imagine a gnome about three and a half feet high, as broad as a brownie and as brown as a berry, with two big dark eyes that shine out of the middle of a perpetual smile.

"Let us first go to the old Turkish prison," said the doctor.

We rode on toward the outskirts of the city and stopped in front of an iron-barred stone building that had once been the detaining-place for people who did not agree in politics with the former rulers. We went inside and through to a middle courtyard containing some trees under which men, women and children lay stretched in the shade. Some of them were sick and some were not, but all seemed oppressed with various stages of despair. And little wonder, for these people had once lived out in the surrounding hills and vales, content to take care of their little places in happiness. But the war had swept their all away, and so they had wandered in to Jerusalem as soon as it was taken by the British and had been assigned to this old structure, where there is at least shelter from the sun by day and from the chill by night. For sustenance they depend upon rations served to them daily by the military authorities. For the rest, they beg and occasionally work. And if there was no love of home in the world or the memory of loved ones long since slain, they might be accorded happy. But a roof over one's head and enough food in one's stomach are not all that is necessary to the sum of happiness.

The doctor went around among them, advising here, prescribing there, with little Marcus chattering his interpretations in his voluble way.

"This man, he have a great beeg pain in hees head. It hurt heem in the back of hees neck."

The man was lying in the midst of his family, on a blanket spread upon the ground. The doctor examined him, first insisting that he take off a wide neckcloth that nearly covered his head. Under the neckcloth was a rag that covered the back of the neck. The man demurred when the doctor attempted to take it away. Said Marcus:

"He say not to do that because he will not get well if you take it from heem."

But the doctor did take it away, and then he uttered an exclamation. "Just look at that, will you?" And everybody looked.

IN THE back of the man's neck was a piece of cord. It entered the skin at the side of the neck, continued under the skin across to the other side, where the end came through. The two ends of the cord had been brought together on the outside and tied in a knot. Naturally it had suppurated, and the chance of blood poison was very great; but the man cherished it because it was the "cure" of a well-known native "doctor," who had ordered that it be kept there for seven years, after which the man's chronic headache would disappear and the cord might be taken out. It was shudderful even to think of. Yet the practice is by no means uncommon.

The doctor proceeded to give the man relief by other means, and continued his work among the people, until he had visited all the ailing ones the prison contained.

In the car again we sped away out of town toward the hills, and presently we came to an encampment of fellahs, as the country-dwelling Arabs are called. They were picturesque in a forlorn way, their tents made of what looked like burlap, their clothes dilapidated, their cooking utensils dingy and dirty. The flat sides of the tents were raised so that it was easy to see the interiors.

In one tent, on a pile of bedding, lay a woman. The doctor found her with a fever and diagnosed the case as malaria. It seemed to be the prevailing ailment among these people, and it seemed to rage in most of the tents. Men and women crowded around with little children in their arms, and to these the doctor paid particular attention, for he is one of those sympathetic souls for whom the moan of a child means just a little more than the complaint of an adult.

We got through after a while, and then we wended our way across the hills to an ancient monastery, once filled with Armenian monks. It was the retreat of pious pilgrims in the early centuries of the Christian era, but now it is the haven of refugees who, like their brothers of the Turkish prison, find in it a temporary harbor after the privations of war. It is full of large rooms with walls painted with pictures of saints and the likenesses of dignitaries of the Greek Church. Lying around on the floors were all sorts and conditions of men, women and children, and, as in the prison, some sick and some not. And some there were who merely pretended to be ill, so that they might be sent to a hospital, where perchance greater quantities of food were to be had. But the doctor had an abundant intuition which enabled him to detect the sham from the real thing, so he was not to be imposed upon.

There was enough of the real, however, to take up all of his attention. In one room an old man lay dying under a window through which a beam of the setting sun came and shone upon his face. It was to be probably his last sensation from the outside world of nature. Across the room lay an old woman. She was half naked, dirty and blind. The doctor did what he could for her, but there was very little he could do. Her span of life was practically run. The gloom of the room followed us out into the sunshine, and would not be dispelled. We crossed the courtyard and came upon a young mother sobbing over a baby, perhaps two years old. The doctor lifted up the covering that rested raggedly upon it. Its stomach was swelled enormously. "Enlarged spleen," remarked the man of medicine, and gave directions for having the suffering child removed at once to the hospital.

On the way out of the monastery, we looked into the chapel—the last evidence of what the ancient functions of the old pile had been. There was one lone monk in attendance. He took us back of the altar and allowed us to gaze down into a hole in the floor at a remnant of the roof of a tree which he declared to be the identical tree from which the cross of Christ had been cut. The thought of the world-stirring tragedy implied in his assertion only added to our gloom, so we hurried out to the motor car and back to Jerusalem.

"Some things they are very bad to see," remarked little Marcus as we sped along. "My Doctor Hurd, he is not happy today."

JERUSALEM is full of little stories that are well worth the telling.

I was walking up the road that leads toward the Russian Compound where we are quartered, when the door of a shop opened and out stepped a little old man with a broom in his hand. The place was the Jerusalem depot of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The old man, who had on no hat, looked like the personification of Socrates, or at least like the commonly accepted likeness of the latter. His pate was bald on top, but it was edged with long white hair that hung upon his shoulders. His thick unkempt beard was also as white as snow and hung far down his breast. His face was yellow, as is common with those of advanced years, for his age must have been far past the threescore-and-ten mark. His name is Whelan—Michael Matthew Whelan—and he is one of the well-known characters of the city. This is his story, which, by the way, was not told by himself:

When Turkey entered the war there was a great scurrying on the part of all the English and their sympathizers to leave Palestine. The general departure in fact took on the semblance of a panic, and among others who wanted to get away was the young man who was temporarily in charge of the depot. He was in doubt as to what to do with the stock of Bibles. He couldn't take them with him, and he did not know whom to place in charge. Then along came Whelan. He had met Whelan before, and knew him for a student of prophecy. Whelan was stranded and was literally without a place to sleep, but being an American he was without much fear of the Turk. He offered to take charge. The custodian promptly fled and Whelan as promptly moved in. He procured an old cot somewhere and moved it in behind the counter. He slept there by night and waited for customers during the day. Few came, wake came the Port Said agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society. He walked into the depot and there sat Whelan, clad in a nondescript costume that was a cross between that of a whirling dervish and the slop-chest of a stranded sailor. He told Whelan who he was. Whelan was not at all impressed. Any one might walk in there and tell him that tale. He was in charge and meant to remain in charge. The agent began to think he had a problem on his hands. He could never leave this strangely clad old man to represent his society, and besides the place was very dirty. Furthermore, he had heard that, since the English came in, Whelan had been selling many Bibles. Whelan admitted it. But, protested the agent, those Bibles belonged to his society, and of course the money should have gone to it. Said Whelan: "How could I send the money to your society when there was no way to send it?"

A new thought dawned on the agent. "Do you mean," he replied, "that you've got the money?" Whereupon Whelan informed him that he had the money intact, except what he had spent for the bare necessities of life.

THE agent did not oust Whelan, and he was glad he did not when he heard of another incident concerning the old man. It will be remembered that when General Allenby entered the city he did it in so unostentatious a manner that the praise of it went around the world. But there was one other happening attendant on that entry that many people here accept as a presage that Jerusalem will not pass back into the hands of the Turk. Just as the generals entered the gate a little white-bearded old man pressed his way through the crowd and, waving aloft one of the best Bibles from the depot, pressed it into the hand of the nearest general (he could not reach Allenby), and exclaimed: "Enter the Holy City in the name of the Lord!"

Yes, old Whelan is one of the characters of the city. Many English officers have heard of him, and almost any day you will find one or more sitting in the depot listening to the old man discourse on the Bible. Some people have called him a crank, but he manages to sell a great many Bibles just the same. I forgot to say that when the agent for the society realized, during his first visit to Whelan, the kind of person he was, he asked the old man on leaving if there was anything he could do for him, and the reply was characteristic:

"No, I guess not. But yes, now that I think of it, you might send me a shirt. I have not had one on for months."

Work for Women Past Forty

IN Chicago the Women's Committee of the National Council of Defense is receiving from forty to fifty calls a day from mature, untrained women wanting work. Many of them are getting it. Experiment and enlightened opinion, no less than the exigencies of war conditions, are demonstrating the usefulness of mature women in occupations heretofore closed to them.

"The woman past forty will be given a chance," says Victor Gannon of the Employers' Association. "But," he adds, "the women must cut out the camouflage. They must not take up an employer's time with the recital of Willie's illness, or how they couldn't cure John of smoking, or how close they came to getting married. And they must forget about their ancestors."

Surprising progress has been made in the last few years throughout many cities in securing the employment of men past forty-five, who had been turned out like old horses to die at the roadside. The "Young Old Men's Association" has worked wonders in this direction. In Chicago alone more than 13,000 positions have been found for men over forty-five years of age in the last nine months.

Much the same influences are being brought to bear in behalf of the women thrown upon their own resources after youth is past. Every sort of evidence goes to show that they are more reliable and attentive to duty than their younger sisters who have not passed the frivolous age. There is no charity in the movement; but it is a plain business proposition, that must appeal to any level-headed employer.

Eighty women and girl lace-makers in the Christian Herald institution. Two hundred other women who cannot leave their children are permitted to earn a living by making lace in their homes and he had to depend upon kind-hearted friends for food.

One day the door opened, and in stalked a Turkish officer who demanded the payment of taxes.

"Taxes!" replied Whelan. "Why, if I had money to pay you taxes, I'd have spent it for something to eat long ago."

The Turk told him that if he did not pay up, his stock of Bibles would be taken. Whelan merely replied that he had no money. The Turk shrugged his shoulders and promised to return. He did in a short time, and renewed his threats. Whelan, having nothing to give, sat tight and waited for the Turk to act.

Presently a squad of Turkish soldiers came and began to take the Bibles off the shelves and tie them up in packages for removal. Then another Turkish officer walked in and began to examine them. Some were in the Greek language, some in Russian, and others in languages he did not recognize at all. He demand of Whelan to know what good were such Bibles to do the Turk. Where could they be sold? Whelan didn't know and couldn't tell him. He was an angry Turk. Plainly there was no graft to be had there, so he mentioned a few maledictions to Whelan and went off in a rage, leaving the Bibles standing on the counter. Whelan undid the packages and put the Bibles back on the shelves.

In the course of time, the English under General Allenby entered Jerusalem. And presently in their

Allies Smashing the Hindenburg Line

AS we went to press with this issue of the Christian Herald, the whole German plan of retreat appeared in danger of collapse. The Hindenburg line was turned in the north and General Mangin's army was threatening the southern flank.

On August 26, Haig's troops were across the Hindenburg line, east of Arras, were fighting in the environs of Bapaume, and were pressing forward against furious resistance along the highway from Bapaume to Peronne, while south of the Somme the French and English pressure was unending against the line through Chaulnes and Roye to Noyon. Lassigny had fallen to the French, Roye was nearly encircled, Noyon was under pressure from three sides, and General Mangin's army south of the Oise and along the Ailette was flanking both Noyon and the German line along the Aisne and Vesle, from Soissons eastward.

Along this entire line, German counter-attacks were constant. Fresh divisions were thrown into the wavering lines. The battle was joined along a front of 57 miles.

On August 27, this 57-mile line saw German armies in retreat again along most of its length. Haig's men were three miles beyond the Hindenburg line, along the road from Arras to Cambrai. Roye was French once more, and the French troops were rapidly following the German rearguards along the whole line, from north of Chaulnes to Noyon. On August 28, the French took Chaulnes and reached the Somme east of Chaulnes and north of Nesle. The Germans were hurrying across the Somme, and their rearguards were fighting desperately to keep the French and English from too rapid pursuit. The rearguards were, however, mastered in many sectors and the Allied forces reached the Somme in time to intercept considerable bodies of the enemy, and to force the flight of thousands more.

Up to the north, English troops working down the Hindenburg line stood before Bullecourt (one of the most intensely fortified villages of this famous line); and Croisilles, slightly west of Bullecourt, itself a highly fortified nest of machine-guns. For three days they formed a bulwark against which the British flood broke in vain; but at last they were taken and remained firmly in British hands.

On August 29, Noyon, outflanked and threatened with envelopment, was evacuated by the Huns, who had to leave too quickly to carry out their threat to destroy the city. The French not only took Noyon, but secured a firm footing on Mount St. Simeon, a dominating height east of Noyon, which gave them gun emplacements on the flanks of the German line north of Noyon. This German line ran along the east side of the unfinished Canal du Nord from Noyon to Ham on the Somme, then along that river to Peronne, and thence northeasterly to the neighborhood of Bullecourt. From Bullecourt the line wayed eastward toward the prepared trench line connecting Queant on the Hindenburg line with Drocourt, west of Douai. This "switch line," as it was called, was being approached by the British troops, which on August 29 entered and passed beyond Bapaume.

August 30 saw the British troops in possession of Bullecourt and Hendecourt, both key positions on the Hindenburg line. But the Germans set too much store by them to let them go lightly, and a fresh division was brought up and thrown against the British, while the British positions were taken under a concentrated bombardment from massed artillery. The British withdrew to the west of the villages and prepared to fight it out. Farther south, Combles and Clery were taken north of Peronne, and the British forced their way to the east bank of the Somme at two places south of the city. The French also made several crossings both of the Somme and of the Canal du Nord, and on the 30th they took the remainder of the positions on Mount St. Simeon east of Noyon and crossed the Oise east of this height, taking several villages and threatening the whole line of heights from Noyon to Chauny.

THE 30th saw another surprise sprung on the German troops north of Soissons at Chavigny and Juvigny. After a week of the most intense fighting here, in which the French had forced their way forward slowly against con-have taken Voormezele, south of Ypres. In the salient north of Soissons, which grows only against almost irresistible resistance, General Mangin's French and American divisions continued to press back the enemy, the French capturing Crecy-au-Mont and Leury with some 1,000 prisoners and the Americans, taking ground on the heights east of Juvigny, penetrating two miles and taking 600 prisoners and two six-inch field guns.

Along the Vesle the fighting was furious throughout the week. The American troops took Bazoches and lost most of Fismette on one day, German and American attacks being launched simultaneously. Thus September 1 saw the battle-line blazing with the flame of combat from Ypres all the way to Rheims, a distance of nearly 125 miles.

On September 1 the Americans, fighting east of Juvigny, crossed the Soissons St. Quentin road and captured Torny-Sorny, completing in five days of furious fighting the objectives set for them. Germany's best divisions were sent in to hold this ground. In the battle, artillery fought almost in the front line on both sides, firing Between July 15 and September 1 the Allies captured 128,302 Germans, of whom 2,674 were officers, besides 2,069 guns, 1,734 mine-throwers, 13,783 machine-guns and great quantities of other materials and ammunition.

The week closes with the Germans still retiring in the center from the Somme salient, but fighting desperately, with men and guns, heavy guns and light ones, to hold their flanks, in the north before Douai and Cambrai, and in the south before St. Quentin, La Fere and Laon. In this fight they are clearly being worsted. Haig stands within eight miles of Cambrai, with the strongest of the Hindenburg and Siegfried lines behind him, while Mangin, in the south, stands on the heights dominating the Chemin-des-Dames positions and with his armies steadily pressing the Germans toward disaster and a much deeper retreat.

Beginning of Order in Siberia

THE presence of the Allied forces, even though their numbers are small, is having immediate effect in reducing disorder in eastern Siberia. American forces encamped in the assembling works of the American Locomotive Company in Vladivostok on August 21 drove back a body of 400 Chinese bandits. On the 26th Gen. Semenov as the result of the support of Japanese troops was able to administer a severe defeat to the Bolshevik forces. On August 25 Gen. Horvath, Commander of the Anti-Bolshevik forces, proclaimed himself leader of all Russian military forces in the far east, and attempted to assume dictatorial power. The Allied leaders, however, brought a sudden end to Gen. Horvath's coup d'etat. He was notified that the authority of the new Siberian government would be upheld and that the Allied governments would recognize only local governments which were based on the free expression of popular sentiment. The withdrawal of the Allied forces along the Ussuri front was halted by the arrival of Japanese troops. The combined Allied forces promptly advanced.

A counter-attack by the Bolsheviks was broken by the Japanese, who made further progress, killing over 300 Bolsheviks and capturing two armored trains and several field guns. On September 3 the Bolshevik forces were retreating along the railroad toward Irkutsk, blowing up bridges and poisoning wells as they fell back.

In Russia proper and in Ukraine, on August 30, peasant forces supported by mutinous German troops were withstanding German attacks. The district and town of Dymera, 24 miles from Kiev, had been put under martial law and its German garrison was besieged by peasants and mutineers. Russian volunteers had also captured from the Germans the port of Movorossyck on the Black Sea. Supplementary agreements between the Bolsheviks and the German foreign office, provide for "free ports" for Russia on the Baltic in the "independent" provinces of Esthonia and Livonia for a payment to Germany of 6,000,000,000 marks of which Ukraine and Finland will pay something like 1,000,000,000 for the recognition of the New Government of Georgia and for the pledge to Germany of a portion of the naphtha production of Baku.

British troops entering the burning ruins of Bapaume on the heels of the retreating Germans stantly stiffening resistance, an American division was hurried in camions from a distant sector. It reached the line at four A.M. and attacked at seven, winning positions from which Juvigny could be attacked. The Americans went forward accompanied by tanks and took their objectives by 10 o'clock. In the evening, the Americans went forward again, taking Juvigny by an encircling movement, losing it later, but retaking it firmly on the following day.

On August 31 the British took Mount St. Quentin, the famous height around which the tides of the battle of the Somme in 1916 came to rest. On the same day the Germans, retreating in the salient along the Lys between Arras and Ypres, withdrew from Mount Kemmel, the last bastion of Allied defense to fall before their April drive.

On September 1 the Australians, driving in from northwest and southeast, took Peronne. On the road from Arras to Cambrai, the British finally retook the fortified villages of Bullecourt and Hendecourt, extending their occupation of the Hindenburg line. Farther north the British pushed ahead to the suburbs of Lens, while in the Lys salient the British, following the retreating Germans, occupied Bailleul and pushed forward to Neuve Eglise and Wolverghem, within two miles of the famous Messines Ridge. Farther north still, American troops were reported to point-blank into the opposing infantry. In one case the American advance line came upon two German six-inch pieces, still firing, but without infantry support. A few shots took care of the horses, and gun crew and guns were quickly captured.

THE big work of September 1 was done along the Arras-Cambrai road by English, Scotch and Canadian troops. Driving forward, with tanks in the van, the British forces stormed the strong entrenchments of the Queant-Drocourt "switch" line and broke through, although they faced the opposition of more than eight German divisions which had been brought up to counter-attack the British at Hendecourt and Bullecourt. The advance reached to the villages of Dury, Cagnicourt and Villers-les-Cagnicourt, sweeping over six miles of the trench system and penetrating three miles beyond the first line. Mount Dury was stormed and Cagnicourt Wood was taken in spite of furious resistance, and the British advance cost the Germans a heavy price in dead, wounded and captures, 10,000 prisoners being taken. On September 3 the Germans evacuated Lens the British moving in and the British stormed forward to a depth of 4 miles on a front of 20 miles north of Queant. They took Queant and passed beyond it toward Cambrai.

President Wilson Proclaims Our Will to Victory

THE Senate, on August 30, unanimously adopted the conference report on the Man Power bill extending the draft ages to 18 to 45. The bill was signed by the President on the 31st, and he at once issued a proclamation setting September 12 as the day for the new registration which will place under orders all the men liable under the constitution for military service. The President's proclamation is as follows:

FIFTEEN months ago the men of the country from 21 to 30 years of age registered. Three months ago and again last month those who had just reached the age of 21 were added. It now remains to include all men between the ages of 18 and 45.

This is not a new policy. A century and a quarter ago it was deliberately ordained by those who were then responsible for the safety and defense of the nation that the duty of military service should rest upon all able bodied men between the ages of 18 and 45. We now accept and fulfil the obligation which they established, an obligation expressed in our national statutes from that time until now. We solemnly purpose a decisive victory of arms and deliberately to devote the larger part of the military man power of the nation to the accomplishment of that purpose.

The younger men have from the first been ready to go. They have furnished voluntary enlistments out of all proportion to their numbers. Our military authorities regard them as having the highest combatant qualities. Their youthful enthusiasm, their virile eagerness, their gallant spirit of daring make them the admiration of all who see them in action. They covet not only the distinction of serving in this great war but also the inspiring memories which hundreds of thousands of them will cherish through the years to come of a great day and a great service for their country and for mankind.

By the men of the older group now called on the opportunity now opened to them will be accepted with the calm resolution of those who realize to the full the deep and solemn significance of what they do.

Having made a place for themselves in their respective communities, having assumed at home the graver responsibilities of life in many spheres, looking back upon honorable records in civil and industrial life; they will realize as perhaps no others could how entirely their own fortunes and the fortunes of all whom they love are put at stake in this war for right and will know that the very records they have made render this new duty the commanding duty of their lives.

They know how surely this is the nation's war, how imperatively it demands the mobilization and massing of all our resources of every kind. They will regard this call as the supreme call of their day and will answer it accordingly.

Only a portion of those who register will be called upon to bear arms.

But all must be registered in order that the selection for military service may be made intelligently and with full information. This will be our final demonstration of loyalty, democracy and the will to win; our solemn notice to all the world that we stand absolutely together in a common resolution and purpose.

It is the call to duty to which every true man in the country will respond with pride and with the consciousness that in doing so he plays his part in vindication of a great cause, at whose summons every true heart offers its supreme service.

A Week in the World's News

LENINE SHOT AT MOSCOW. Nikolai Lenin, Bolshevik Premier, was shot by a woman, Dora Kaplan, a Social Revolutionary, at Moscow on August 30. He was reported to have died on the 31st, but later reports told of his improvement and probable recovery.

LABOR MARCHES FOR VICTORY. The parades and mass meetings with which American Labor marked and celebrated its day, on September 2, were "win the war" demonstrations in every part of the nation. In New York a parade of 60,000 men from the shipyards and munition factories and from the various trades of the city was reviewed in Fifth Avenue by Secretary of Labor Wilson. Instead of banners portraying the advance of Labor's cause and outlining its goals and purposes, the banners this year had little to say about hours and wages and much to say about "liberty," "humanity," and "democracy." Each union delegation carried a banner telling the number of its men in the service and declaring that those left behind were doing their bit, while the heartiest cheers of the watching multitudes were given to the boiler-makers and other men from the shipyards, who marched by in overalls and blouses. The pile drivers proclaimed that "Labor is loyal with Wilson to Victory," and the carpenters carried a banner declaring, "We build the ways and build the ships that make the Bridge to France." In Chicago 250,000 men marched in the greatest parade of Chicago's history. President Wilson recognized the importance of Labor Day by issuing a proclamation in which he said in part:

Labor Day, 1918, is not like any Labor Day that we have known. Labor Day was always deeply significant with us. Now it is supremely significant. . . . We now know that every tool in every essential industry is a weapon, and a weapon wielded for the same purpose that an army rifle is wielded—a weapon which if we were to lay down no rifle would be of any use.

And a weapon for what? What is the war for? Why are we enlisted? Why should we be ashamed if we were not enlisted? At first it seemed hardly more than a war of defense. . . . But it is clear now that it is much more than a war to alter the balance of power in Europe. Germany, it is now plain, was striking at what free men everywhere desire and must have—the right to determine their own fortunes, to insist upon justice, and to oblige Governments to act for them and not for private and selfish interest of a governing class. . . . Not until the war is won can men anywhere live free from constant fear or breathe freely while they go about their daily tasks and know that governments are their servants, not their masters.

This is, therefore, the war of all wars, which labor should support and support with all its concentrated power. . . .

You know the nature of this war. It is a war which industry must sustain. The army of laborers at home is as important, as essential, as the army of fighting men in the far fields of actual battle. And the laborer is not only needed as much as the soldier. It is his war. The soldier is his champion and representative. To fail to win would be to imperil everything that the laborer has striven for and held dear since freedom first had its dawn and its struggle for justice began. . . .

Let us make this, therefore, a day of fresh comprehension, not only for what we are about and of renewed and clear-eyed resolution but a day of consecration also. . . .

We may count upon each other. The nation is of a single mind. It is taking counsel with no special class. . . . The light of a new conviction has penetrated to every class amongst us. We realize as we never realized before that we are comrades dependent upon one another, irresistible when united, powerless when divided. And so we join hands to lead the world to a new and better day.

WAR PROHIBITION JULY FIRST. The Senate, on August 28, adopted the prohibition amendment to the Food Stimulation Bill. It is expected that the House will accept the amendment. The ultimate dry date was finally placed at July 1, 1919. All manufacture of beer and wines must cease on May 1, 1919, no distilled liquors are now being made, and all sales of liquors of every degree, except for medicinal and sacramental purposes must stop on June 30, 1919. From that date, "during the continuance of the present war and the period of demobilization" the whole nation will be dry territory.

A DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR. Secretary Baker, on August 27, announced the appointment of John D. Ryan to be Second Assistant Secretary of War with full responsibility for the air service of the Army. Mr. Edward R. Stettinius, now representing the war Department in France, will cease to act as Second Assistant Secretary, but will continue to exercise all the power over purchases placed in his hands in that position. Mr. Ryan announced on August 28 that the De Haviland plane was now being produced in quantities, and that orders had been given for 50,000 twelve-cylinder Liberty Motors, for a large number of eight-cylinder engines, and also for a large number of foreign engines. He announced also that all of our Allies were calling for Liberty engines to equip planes which they were able to produce faster than they could build motors.

GOMPERTS IN ENGLAND. Samuel Gompers and a party of Labor leaders reached London on August 28. Mr. Gompers has gone abroad to bring about a thorough accord between the labor organizations of allied countries.

MEXICANS AND AMERICANS FIGHT. An attempt to evade the challenge of an American sentry on the international line at Nogales, Ariz., resulted in a skirmish between American and Mexican troops, on August 27. The firing continued until 5:30 in the afternoon and intermittently all night. Expressions of regret were exchanged on the following day between the Mexican and American generals. The American casualties were 2 killed and 28 wounded, and the Mexicans 13 killed and 15 wounded, including 4 women.

PEACE PRIZE TO WAR CHARITIES. The peace prize turned over to Congress by former President Roosevelt for the purpose of establishing a peace commission was returned to Mr. Roosevelt at his request and was divided among various organizations now employed in alleviating the burden of war. Col. Roosevelt on August 25 made public the distribution of the fund, which amounted to $45,482.83, as follows:

To the American Red Cross, $6,900; to Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., for Y. M. C. A. work in France, $5,000; to the National War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A., War Activities Committee, Knights of Columbus, Jewish Welfare Board for War Activity, the War Work Council Y. M. C. A., colored, $4,000 each; the Italian Red Cross, the Czechoslovaks at Vladivostok, Madame Botchkareva, Herbert C. Hoover for the Belgian refugees in Holland, the Serbian minister, for Serbian sufferers, Paul Shimon, for Armenian and Syrian Christians, $1,000 each; various others received $500 apiece, and $82.82 was used for cabling and other expenses in connection with the distribution.

NO MORE WHEATLESS DAYS. [The Food Administration, on August 27, announced that as result of the conference of the Allied Food Administrators a standard war bread had been established for all Allied countries. This bread is to consist 80 per cent. of wheat flour and 20 per cent. of substitutes. The new regulations permit a 60 days' supply in the home instead of a 30 days' supply, and wheatless days and meals are discontinued.

SPAIN SEIZES GERMAN SHIPS. Following the torpedoing of another Spanish ship, the Ataz-Mindi, the Spanish Government, on September 2, seized one of the interned German merchantmen. Later all the ninety German ships in Spanish harbors were taken over by the Spanish authorities. The Spanish merchant marine has lost 20 per cent of its tonnage, and 100 sailors have lost their lives through U-boat lawlessness.

HAYWOOD GETS 20 YEARS. Federal Judge K. M. Landis in Chicago, on August 30, sentenced 95 of the 100 I. W. W. leaders recently convicted of conspiracy to handicap the nation in its war activities. Big Bill Haywood and 14 other heads of the organization were sentenced to serve sentences of twenty years at Leavenworth and to pay $20,000 each in fines, 33 lesser leaders received sentences of ten years' imprisonment, 33 others five years, 12 one year and one day, and 2 got off with jail sentences of 10 days. In passing sentence the Judge told the defendants, "In times of peace you have a legal right to oppose, by free speech, preparations for war. But when war has been declared that right ceases forthwith."

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The Fuel Administration, on August 27, called upon the public in all the states east of the Mississippi to cease the use, on Sunday, of all classes of automobiles, motor cycles, and motor boats except for absolute necessary work. . . . Walter Hines Page, American Ambassador to Great Britain, has resigned because of ill health and will soon return to America. It is rumored that Thomas Nelson Page, now ambassador to Italy who arrived in London on August 27, might succeed the retiring ambassador. . . . Senator Ollie M. James of Kentucky died on August 28 at Baltimore aged 47 years. . . . Primary elections in Michigan resulted in the nomination of Henry Ford for Senator on the Democratic ticket and of Truman H. Newberry on the Republican ticket. The primaries in South Carolina nominated Nat B. Dial, for the Senate, ex-Governor Cole M. Blease being badly defeated; in Montana Miss Jeannette Rankin was defeated for the nomination to the Senate by Dr. Lundstrum. . . . In order to finance large Army purchases in Spain Spanish bankers loaned to the United States [government] $75,000,000. . . . American submarine chaser No. 209 operating out of Philadelphia was mistaken for an enemy submarine by an American armed steamer on August 27 and was sunk by shell fire from the steamer. Seventeen of her crew were missing at last reports. . . . A German submarine was still operating on the fishing banks during the past week. On August 26, five fishing boats were sunk, and on the following day a new fishing schooner on her first trip was sent to the bottom. . . . The American shipyards in the week ending August 24 launched nineteen ships and completed eight. . . . Nicaragua, having refused to accept the judgment of the King of Spain in her long standing boundary dispute with Honduras, and both nations having mobilized troops along the line and hostilities appearing imminent, the good offices of the United States were offered and were accepted by both disputants. The controversy was referred to Washington on August 29.

A Service Star Turns Gold

ON Wednesday, August 21, 1918, Lieutenant Conrad Crawford, commanding a part of Company B, 47th Infantry U. S. A., was ordered to take and occupy the crest of hill 220 "Somewhere in France." The orders were not to retire under any circumstances. Every man in the detachment knew the peril and faced it bravely. Just as Lieutenant Crawford, at the head of his men, reached the crest of the hill, he fell with a bullet through his heart. His brother, Captain Gilbert Crawford, was in the fight not far away.

Lieutenant Crawford was the youngest son of the late Rev. G. H. Crawford and a nephew of Dr. Louis Klopsch, the founder of the Christian Herald. His mother was a daughter of the Rev. Stephen Merritt. Lieutenant Crawford's sister, Dr. Mary Crawford is one of a body of American physicians who went to France early in the war. In a letter dated July 26, he said, "I hope in a short time I will be able to tell you that I have had a share in the fighting. Isn't it a grand and glorious little old drive we are having over here?"

The family has learned that his grave has been found and is plainly marked.

Mary Ellis Meets a Spy

THIS week we all started on a trip to France with Mary Ellis, the girl from Orchard St. We admire her spunk, we love her for the enemies she has made and we are happy clear through when her service to the boys in camp becomes the door to that greater service of which she had dreamed. Next week we will find her at work in France, but, in a little moonlight inspection of her field of work, she meets a mysterious stranger, apparently, a French guard, who, she later fears, may be a German spy.

That boy! What sort of a man will he be? Next week we will look into the matter and see what may be done with the boys.

Next week also a message of cheer and new hope, "Recognition in Eternity," by Rev. C. E. Wincott; more pictures in rotogravure, a new map of the battle fields in France and a few minutes with Marion Harland.

That Girl from Orchard Street

By C. COURTNEY SAVAGE

CHAPTER I

"At any rate, you'll have to admit that that girl from Orchard Street, as you call her, is unusual," Luther Terry said meekly. "At any rate you'll have to admit that—"

"Unusual, yes; and stop repeating yourself." Mrs. Terry was as emphatic as her husband was meek, and she glared at him, as if condemning him to some realm reserved for the weak-minded.

"I'm perfectly willing to admit that Mary Ellis is unusual, and equally glad to say that fortunately it is not the ordinary thing for young women to cut up the way she does. And her being unusual is no reason why you should not scold Frank for having stood there talking with her at least half an hour. I don't see how they can let her into a respectable place like the Church House gymnasium."

Luther Terry frowned, but said no more. He had in mind that the entertainment in question had been a public affair, admission fifty cents. Still he knew that Mrs. Terry would have some argument capable of offsetting any he offered. So he went out of the house and down the street.

And it was an odd coincidence that the first woman he raised his hat and spoke to was Mary Ellis.

Mary Ellis deserves a page in the social history of Westport entirely for herself. Certainly no other member of the community had received so much constant attention in the past ten years; and assuredly no man, woman, or child had caused so many heated discussions.

And through it all Mary Ellis went about her own business, looking neither to the right nor to the left, but seeming always to be aiming at some particular star. Not that all the discussion was unknown to her. Westport never said anything behind a person's back. Instead, they preferred that the object of their conversation knew what was said—and suffered accordingly. Many a night Mary Ellis had cried herself to sleep, only to awake the following morning with a little set expression about her mouth and a wistful look in her dark eyes which said, "Just wait; I'll be somebody yet!"

THE chance to be somebody—that was the tragedy of Mary Ellis's life. Had she been contented to live as her next-door neighbors, she would have been happy; but Mary Ellis's soul reached out for a higher and greater existence than a scant education, an early marriage, and a large family.

"Some day there will be work for me to do," she used to tell herself, and on rare occasions any one who won her confidence. "Some day I'll be wanted. All my life I've wished for what I call my chance to be—and wishes do come true." Then she would laugh and look wistful.

"Why don't you get some sort of work in the city?" one truly sympathetic adviser had once asked. "Why don't you try settlement work, or learn to be a kindergarten teacher? You might even do welfare work at the factory."

"Because I don't want to do any kind of work, anywhere," was the straightforward answer. "I don't have to work, you know; but I'm going to, when the right place is offered me."

That was one of the rankling facts about Mary Ellis—she did not have to work. Her father was the only blacksmith left in Westport, and he had sufficient jobs offered him every week to make it necessary for him to keep busy four forges and half a score of men. For twenty years, Pete Ellis had been slowly amassing a reputation and a fortune. The fortune was not considerable, but the reputation was; he became intoxicated every Saturday afternoon, and on two or three well-remembered occasions had been found early Sunday morning lying in the gutter. He was always sober again by Monday, and in spite of what is said about the effects of drink on a man's business skill, he went right on making and saving money.

Of course, if Pete Ellis had been of a different stock, or if Mary's mother had lived, the history of "that girl from Orchard Street" would, in all probability, never have been written. The reason for Mary Ellis's story could be sifted down to a street and its people. Mrs.

Ellis would surely have moved away from Orchard Street fifteen years before, and under a wife's guidance Pete would have become Mr. Peter Ellis, and been so busy attending to his social affairs out of business hours that there would have been no time for strong drink.

As it was, Pete still lived in Orchard Street; and, until she had been fourteen, Mary had run with the pack.

WESTPORT itself is a typical Eastern American village. It is not more than fifty minutes' ride from a sizable city, and many of its male inhabitants go there daily so that they may raise their families and spend their nights and Sundays in the country. The rest of the men either thrive as local merchants or work in the town's one industry: the Cutlery Factory. Of course, there are always those who are less fortunate financially than others, and they live on Spring Street, or Maple—both of which start from Orchard, the one street in the town that typifies the poor.

The question that many people raised after hearing about Mary Ellis is: why, if Pete Ellis had money, Mary did not persuade her father to move away from Orchard Street. She had tried that, more than once, years ago, when as a high school girl she was attempting to be socially correct and popular with her classmates. Her father had paid no attention to her at the first few requests, but once, when she became insistent, he had turned furiously toward the girl and told her that the house where she was born, the house in which her mother had died, was quite good enough for him, and any time she wished better she could go out and find it.

The thought of leaving her father and her home, the thought that she was ashamed of a home that her dead mother had sanctified, the ferocity of his tone, had startled the girl, and never again, even in the moments of greatest embarrassment, did Mary think of moving away from the big unpainted house on Orchard Street.

Mary's whole trouble was that from her dead mother she had inherited a sense of liking for the finer, beautiful things in life. Mrs. Ellis was dead before the girl was ten, and for four long years Mary Ellis had been the biggest tomboy in the town. The middle-aged Irishwoman whom Pete Ellis hired as a housekeeper could do nothing with the girl, and her father did not try. She ran the streets ragged and dirty, she was dreaded by boys years older than she was, hated by school-teachers, yet in reality she was only good-hearted, mischievous, filled with a rare sense of humor—and at fourteen as ugly as it is possible for a growing girl to be.

THE change that came over her was, to onlookers, sudden and unexplained. She had graduated in June from grammar school with high marks for scholarship and very low marks for deportment, and the principal, in going over the list of those who were eligible for high school, sighed and remarked to the clerk in his office that he supposed they were rid of Mary Ellis.

"It's a shame, too," he added. "Why, if that girl were to be shut up in some sort of a reform school and made to study, she would be a scholar. She's more than ordinarily bright."

That remark alone, had Mary Ellis heard it, might have touched the sensitive soul of a girl just verging from childhood into the deeper waters of maturity—for Mary Ellis at fourteen was beginning to realize that convention is a social law to be obeyed and that it was of importance that she conform with the things that people about her said and thought.

In reality the change came over Mary Ellis because she formed an ideal. As was customary in Westport, the graduation classes of both the grammar and high schools attended service at the Methodist Church the third Sunday evening in June.

The speaker of the night was an alumnus of the school, a young missionary home on a brief furlough from his work in an Oriental country. He was quite young, with clean laughing eyes and an infectious smile, and he told them simply of the joys of work in the great world that was unfolding for them.

Mary had been impressed by the man, but his young wife, who had sung for them, sent a shaft of longing into Mary's soul. To be like her! To be able to love people and serve them—to help them, to be loved in return! The woman in the choir loft did not know of Mary Ellis—but after she was gone, flitting like a sun ray across a clouded sky, the ideal that had been set up in the young girl's heart grew each day, and each day beckoned Mary toward a noble womanhood.

In her hours of thinking Mary rather pictured her dead mother, whose memory she worshiped, as being like the minister's wife, sweet and gentle. Even though she knew that her ideal was miles away, Mary went back time after time to the church where it seemed she could always see her standing. Mary had never before been a regular church attendant; no one had suggested to her that she join a Sunday school, and for that reason the services were a novelty that fast became an inspiration. She would slip into the back seat each Sunday, follow the service intently, and then as the last "amen" sounded would slip out again.

THE direct result of this awakening of Mary Ellis was that people noticed she had stopped calling names after the leading citizens, stopped playing ball with the boys, stopped eatching onto grocer's wagons and hanging about Main Street after dark. A sense of personal pride was born in her, and she appeared cleanly and neatly dressed, going about her own business, which was either an errand for her home, or a visit to the public library, for Mary had always been fond of books. But there was even more awakening than appeared on the surface.

That fall Mary Ellis entered high school.

It's rather useless to go into the details of the ten years that followed. Those who have lived in a small town know what Mary went through—the snubs, the sneers, the patronizing, the vain attempt to keep up with the petty social life of the school, the girls and boys who stopped talking when she appeared and laughed after she left, the teachers who knew only of the old reputation and did not understand.

Mary Ellis—growing into a tall, striking girl, with great dark eyes, a mass of chestnut brown hair, supple of limb, handsome as to features—found that the new life she had taken upon herself was not an easy one. There were moments when she wished she were dead—such as the one when Mrs. John Seymour Pike, who had been really chatty with her at the picnic the day before, refused to speak, or even bow, when she passed Mary on Main Street, because Mary was talking with a trolley ear conductor. Of course, Mrs. Pike did not know that the trolley ear conductor lived next door to Mary and was sending a message home. How could she know? For Mrs. Pike had never been on Orchard Street.

It was all the fault of Orchard Street. Small towns look with lifted eyebrows on their poorer quarters and resent the climber, no matter how firmly placed the ladder with which they climb.

Mary Ellis was no snob, and when she met a neighbor on Main or Fulton Street she smiled and spoke. They all loved Mary Ellis—they worshiped her. The spirit of practical Christianity was about her as an invisible mantle. If there was sickness or death, her long slender fingers were ready to give aid, and if rejoicing was in order, she planned simple little parties that were not costly.

FREQUENTLY as she walked down town, dirty, ragged children called after her, and she always stopped and spoke to them, sometimes taking them with her for treats of ice cream or candy. There were some in Westport who were far-sighted enough to admire Mary Ellis and invite her to their homes. These were mostly people she met through the church, elderly maiden ladies, or married folk who did not "go out."

Mary Ellis had some boy friends—and she might have had many—but those she really wished to know did not ask to call, and the others were not of a type that interested her. Frank Terry, for instance, always spoke to her, in spite of his mother's indignation, and when on a rare occasion she was present at some function he would single her out and talk with her or take her in for refreshments. But, he, and the rest of them, never asked to call at the Orchard Street house.

Still Mary survived it all, and had even had the courage to go back to school for a post-graduate course of an extra year. She now was an apt student, and as there were few invitations to parties, and as she was never even welcome at the school baseball games (she was fond of baseball and could throw far and straight) she had plenty of opportunity to study. At the end of five years she could speak French and German (speak, remember, not read it just well enough to pass an examination), and had read enough good books to lay a foundation for future reading. All in all, Mary Ellis had enough "book learning" at the end of her five years to put to shame most of the people who held college diplomas. Mary Ellis did not go to college—perhaps she did not feel that she could stand the chance of meeting there some one from Westport. At any rate, she lived in Orchard Street, doing everything she could for those about her, trying to find happiness, and always waiting for the rising of her star.

And then one day, when she was hardly more than twenty-one, news of war came crashing out from Europe; and something happened to Mary Ellis.

CHAPTER II

MARY ELLIS was one of the first women in Westport to knit sweaters and socks for the Belgians. The plight of the stricken little country seemed to touch the heartstrings of the girl who had also suffered, and she turned much of her energies toward the trifles she could do that would ease the grief of that far-away people. She carefully put aside a portion of her liberal allowance and bought sweets to go to the men in the trenches. She knit constantly, and she attended patriotic meetings of protest which she hoped would show the Kaiser that the people of the United States did not approve of his "scrap of paper" argument.

Then, as the women of the local Red Cross began to work as the local Red Cross had never worked before, she found a chance for even greater service. Some one was needed to stay in the rooms, and there was no demur when Mary Ellis offered to spend several hours a week on duty at the headquarters.

Hours of work? Never! For the first time in her life Mary Ellis "belonged." When the Mexican flurry caused the soldiers to go marching off, and Red Cross kits were in demand, Mary literally rolled up her sleeves and did more work than ever. And how she could work! Willingly, hour after hour, she supervised the packing of bundles, gave out wool to be knitted into sweaters, socks, or mufflers, answered the ever-ringing telephone, and all without being tired or becoming cross.

Even the village mothers who had raised their eyebrows at Mary smiled and admitted that she was a good worker.

Then, nearly three years later, came April 6, 1917, and the proclamation of war. Instantly Mary Ellis found additional labors. She lived in a constant whirl of service, and in her heart a great growing interest told her that she would never be happy until she was "over there." She kept up her daily duties, but wrote lengthy letters to various organizations she felt might use her. She found that she could not serve as a nurse because she had not technical training. The Y. M. C. A. sent her a letter suggesting a call, but Mary Ellis was frankly afraid that should there be an investigation as to character, some one in Westport would cast a slur, and her chance would be gone. As never before, a spirit of hatred for Westport crept into her heart; for Westport seemed to stand as a wall between her and the thing she wanted most.

The spirit of hatred disappeared, however, when two companies of soldiers, detached from their regiment and assigned to the study of special work, encamped on the plains outside Westport. Immediately almost before the last tent-stake was driven, Mary Ellis was on the ground offering sandwiches and milk. Overnight she took it upon herself to become the mother of every man in uniform.

A FEW weeks passed, and the soldier boys, for some reason, grew to prefer the big rambling house on Orchard Street to the other houses in town. In less than a week the place was a canteen, and Mary was busy every afternoon and evening playing hostess to the fellows in khaki. And, of course, the social light of Westport objected.

"I think it's disgraceful," Mrs. John Seymour Pike said severely, as she rooked back and forth on the veranda of the Westport County Club. "Why, I asked two of these men to take tea with me yesterday afternoon, but they said they could not get away in the afternoon as well as in the evening. I asked where they were going in the evening, and they said that every Thursday there was a party at Mary Ellis's. They preferred to go to the Ellis home rather than mine," and in her anger she dropped a stitch of her knitting.

Not that she minded having to rip out two rows it seemed to appease her disposition. She, like every woman present, was eager to find a solution for the problem that they felt must be faced at once. The truth was that they were jealous, for the fellows liked Mary Ellis best. She had an easy way with them, a way of letting them alone to do as they pleased. They came into her big shabby home, found comfortable chairs, a piano, and a victrola. Mary Ellis had a few girl friends she could ask to help entertain the soldiers.

"And to think that Captain Purcell would take his own mother to call on Mary!" a woman at the next table to Mrs. Pike remarked.

"Well, you know that all sorts of men make up an army."

"Yes, but this woman was a lady. She's Mrs. Robert Purcell—and they're very rich. She came from the city in her own limousine. She called on Mary at the Red Cross rooms and invited her to luncheon at the Garden Hotel. I know, for I saw them go." This was indeed an event, for the Garden Hotel, just outside the town, was patronized by the élite of the land.

"How strange!"

"Yes, that's what I thought. And two days afterward she called on Mary—in the evening. The woman who does my wash lives a couple of doors away—she tells me a great deal about Mary." She did not mention, however, that the washerwoman frequently compared Mary to a saint, that the girl carried sunshine into every corner of the street. That would have spoiled the story.

"Well, for my part, I can't imagine any good going on at the parties—and I'm sure that the proper thing to do would be to get some one else for the Red Cross rooms. We're really doing so very much business that we ought to have some one able to give all their time—all their time."

"We could say that," Mrs. Pike said quickly. "It would be an excuse, and she would understand."

"Yes, an excuse," said Mrs. Smith, a large stout woman with a flat face that spoke aloud of her eminent respectability. "But why not tell the truth? Why not tell the girl that she is leading a wilful immoral life? That—"

"But is she?" two or three women asked quickly.

AND as neither Mrs. Smith nor any other man or woman could say that Mary had ever done one thing which would place her beyond the moral pale, the question of a secretary who could give all day every day to her Red Cross duties was called to Mary Ellis's attention, and she took the hint and resigned.

She did not resign, however, the place that she held in the hearts of the companies of young men drilling in the big fields just beyond the city.

She still fed them; still supplied candy and ice cream; and one day, finding a young officer busy with a French lesson, she was inspired to hold classes in simple French. For the first time in her life Mary Ellis was truly happy.

Then came the fall rains. The camp beyond the city was only a temporary affair; those who had built it expected any minute the orders that would send them overseas. The equinox came first, however, and with it long hard storms, howling winds that sent the rain driving against the tents in long lashes, and made the drill grounds a pool of water.

It was during those few days that Mary Ellis proved her worth. There was a small hospital tent attached to the unit, but with fifty men ill with sore throats and petty colds, the doctor and his small staff was overwhelmed. Mary Ellis, with her practical knowledge of nursing learned on Orchard Street, went out to the camp with a white dress under her raincoat, and while the doctor was waiting for nurses and other aid from headquarters, Mary Ellis spent hours taking temperatures, giving medicine from a spoon, and telling the mess sergeant what food was good for a man with fever.

At the end of the week the effects of the rain had disappeared, and so had the colds; but Mary Ellis had won a respect that few women receive from any man. They had liked her before—they had enjoyed the recreation she could give them; they had respected her; but now she was one of them; she was a

The Faith of the Soldier

MUCH has been written by army chaplains, and occasionally a paragraph or two by busy news correspondents, concerning the faith of our men at the front. One of the most illuminating articles we have recently encountered on this subject is a contribution by Lieutenant Harold Hersey in Scribner's Magazine. He tells us that the American soldier of our new army is still the civilian of other days.

Distinctions of faith, we are informed, have largely disappeared among the Protestants in the army.

Each man clings to the early lessons his mother taught him, and he finds that those same lessons are strangely similar to those of opposing faiths—the Baptist clings daily with the Presbyterian, the Congregationalist with the Episcopalian. Fair-splitting differences are unknown among them. As a result—the men are gradually molded into a hardy faith that rests only on the fundamental solidities of human nature. . . . After all, each one of them is a soldier, and as long as each lives up to certain standards, it makes little difference.

Our soldiers' attitude toward the chaplains is interestingly described. They are impatient of speeches or sermons that are not grounded firmly in their daily scheme of life.

To appeal to them one must speak a direct, vital language. They want to believe in the man who is asking them to do things. Lengthy talks are worse than useless. . . . The religion of these men is a strangely simple thing after all. We can't expect them to have any patience with nebulous fancies or airy theories.

Such is the picture we are given of the typical American soldier at the front. Honor, courage and ruth, he learns to value as cardinal virtues. Religion to him must be real, or it is nothing. His own faith under such developing influences has shown itself to be clean and aboveboard. The faithless or bad—those who prove impossible in such an atmosphere—are weeded out. This observant writer concludes:

In all these months of service it is only natural that my close observations have taught me much about the faith of the man in service. I have learned, for example, that he believes firmly and irrevocably in a higher Being. I have not yet met a man who did not believe this. I have gathered that although sharp religious discriminations separate certain individuals, they are perfectly willing to seek advice from a chaplain of any faith, provided that chaplain proves himself a real man.

Millions of these men will by-and-by come back to us, changed in matters of thought and their attitude toward religion strangely intensified. They will want a practical religion that appeals to the soul and to the whole life. They will continue to look away over the denominational fences and will have little patience with disputes about non-essentials. Men who have held of God daily in the face of danger and death, who have had fellowship with Him who is at once Redeemer and Friend, and walked with Him in the long night vigil of the trenches, will not attach much importance to sectarian distinctions, which they can only view as a sort of wire entanglements to hinder spiritual progress.

Only a few days ago, a minister of national reputation, famous as a preacher, lecturer and author, visited us and in the course of conversation said: "It will be a new world, with new conditions, new opportunities, after the war. Our great army of men at the front who face death hourly, have sifted religion down to the vital truths, and they will have no tolerance for old ecclesiastical wrangles and distinctions. When they come back, they will want all the tangles cut out so that they may get at the eternal verities. It would be a preposterous anomaly to suppose that the old lines which divide American Protestantism into something like a hundred and fifty different rival sects could stand. They will ultimately disappear; they are being uprooted even now. But it can be hastened by a realignment of our spiritual forces which will give the bodies a basis of mutuality and spiritual fellowship. This is the destiny of the Church. The denominations might take a lesson from the experiences of the allies in the war. While each of our armies fought in its own way, and upon its own initiative, choosing its own time and place, they made but little progress. But when all were placed under a single great leader, and marched and fought in obedience to the generalissimo's command, the entire situation was changed! The forces of tyranny and oppression were flung back in confusion and disaster, and the united armies pressed on from victory to victory. Yet no single regiment, or corps, or battalion, or brigade has lost its individuality. So will it be in our churches when they come on the field together in the great drive against sin's embattled hosts. Fighting unitedly under a single great Commander, they will be irresistible."

We have here two views of the same question from different angles: one, that of a soldier, and the other that of a lifelong churchman. Both point to the same conclusion—that the problem is one which the Church must face with courage and wisdom.

Nurses Needed Abroad and at Home

WHEN we entered the war there were 900 nurses in our army and 452 medical officers. Today we have 12,000 nurses and 18,000 medical officers. This is only the first quick step in the development of our military hospital staff.

The ratio of 400 nurses for 25,000 men is the fixed military ratio, a definite computation of military demands. Sixteen thousand nurses for 1,000,000 men is the quota, which proportion maintained means that 80 per cent. of our casualties will be returned to the line of battle as sound fighting units.

Civilian hospitals at home are being drained to meet the demand for nurses for the army, but civilian measures can and must meet this shortage. It can be clearly seen that next to the enlistment of men the enrolment of army nurses is of the greatest importance.

Thoroughly trained nurses only can be accepted for service at the fronts. Compared with the requirements their number is limited. Several times 16,000 trained nurses may be needed.

The untrained girls in tens of thousands, eager to serve, but refused appointment abroad, will find countless opportunities to serve in the hospitals at home, and in thus releasing the trained nurses for the work abroad will be rendering high service direct to the nation. Here is an opportunity for patriotic girls that will be practically unlimited. At the same time they will be performing a noble work of mercy in helping the sick and alleviating pain.

The Insanity of German Conquest

ANOTHER German peace offensive is reported "on high diplomatic authority" to be in preparation. Tempting offers will be made to several of the Entente nations, we are told, but just what form these overtures will take must for the present be left to conjecture. Germany will be ready to make almost any sacrifice to end the war; but such willingness will only veil the Teutonic purpose of making preparations for another attempt at world conquest when a favorable opportunity presents itself.

This conviction that Germany will ask for peace in order that she may secretly prepare for war, is strengthened by the recent speech of Wichtl, an Austrian deputy and a leading member of the German Radicals in the Reichsrat. In an address at Winisch-Feistritz, he gave what purports to be an outline of Austria's policy. It looks forward to a closer union with Germany, politically, economically and for military purposes. When this close alliance is satisfactorily concluded, Germany and Austria will be "one nation, where not only German will be spoken, but German ideas thought and German battles fought," declared Deputy Wichtl, and he added his characteristic Junker threat: "There will be no longer two States, but only one great Germany, and then we shall wage a new war! Then we shall deliver three mighty blows to the end of forcing our way to America, subduing the Orient, and establishing the German power over Japan and China."

So accustomed has the world become to German plots and intrigues, that even this amazing boast of a war-crazed Austrian deputy cannot be wholly disregarded. The nation which secretly planned to embroil the United States in a war with Mexico, and to incite revolution in India, Ireland and Canada; which honeycombed Russia and America with her spies and plotters, and which is shown, by the testimony of certain of her own officials, to have deliberately planned the present war, is capable, even amid the ruins of her present gigantic failure, of planning a war of revenge to wreck civilization, and of using a patched-up peace as a subterfuge. Insane for world-conquest, the Kaiser and his advisers have overlooked the fact that all through history would-be world-conquerors have met disaster. Now the pillars of Junkerdom are falling. All his plans for victory have turned to dust and ashes. His invincible Hindenburg line is breaking in pieces. The "sacred soil" of Germany is threatened with invasion, and the final crash is impending, which will leave a pile of ruins as the only monument to his mad efforts at world conquest.

Servants of the Public

DIRECTOR-GENERAL McADOO has taken a decided stand toward railway employees that are treating the public with even less consideration and courtesy under government control of the railroads than they did under private control. In a strong statement he makes it clear that the old-time railroad attitude of contempt for the public must be radically changed and employees from the highest to the lowest must recognize themselves as servants of the public.

"There are many people," the Director-General says, "who, for partisan or selfish purposes, wish government operation of the railroads to be a failure. Every employee who is discourteous to the public is helping these partisan or selfish interests to discredit government control of railroads."

Recently the wages of railroad employees were largely increased, involving an addition to railroad operating expenses of more than $475,000,000 per annum. In order to meet this increase the public has been called upon to pay largely increased passenger and freight rates. The people have accepted this new burden cheerfully and patriotically. The least that every employee can do in return is to serve the public courteously, faithfully and efficiently.

Prisoners and the Labor Shortage

THE man who starves on an unworked farm deserves and receives little sympathy. It's his own fault. America to-day needs men. The army gets its men, but the fields cry out for hands to till them, and in the factories idle machines proclaim their need. Women are taking up tasks not only unwonted but in many cases unsuited to them, and are making good even in the hardest places. Boys and girls by thousands are entering the ranks of industry. Yet the nation needs men. And it has more than 110,000 of them penned up in prisons.

Under the laws of many of the states, the labor of prisoners may not be used in any gainful occupation; they cannot be leased to contractors or, as prisoners, put to work in the factories. Thousands of them are first offenders; thousands of others have never had a chance to show the manhood within them. Many have been victims of vicious surroundings and of a criminal law that planned to convict. Given a fair chance, a considerable proportion of these men would go straight. In four years the Prisoners' Relief Society has placed in jobs 10,000 men released from prisons, some of them being fourth and fifth termers. They are working in shops, in business houses, in factories and on the railroads. Ninety-five per cent. of these men have made good; and those who have closely studied the problem feel justified in believing that 95 per cent. of the 110,000 now practically idling behind prison walls would also make good.

One of the editors of the Christian Herald recently visited a prison and had a chance of seeing 900 of the 1100 prisoners gathered together in the chapel. There were some whose faces showed weakness, and others who bore evidence of past sins, but the majority of the faces were clear-eyed, clean, purposeful—the faces of men who wanted to make good.

There is a movement on foot—which is gathering momentum—to admit to parole men now in prison who the authorities believe can be paroled without danger to the community. Organizations exist by which such men can find employment at once in the waiting fields and shops. Under parole, a misstep means immediate return to prison walls. Under present conditions in the employment field, faithful service leads to rapid advancement. The present situation presents an opportunity to reduce the criminal class by giving men who have made a good prison record, the opportunity they yearn for and crave—a chance to make good and to become men among men.

The War Labor Policies Board at Washington is working for the passage by Congress of legislation that will make possible the employment of prison labor for the period of the war for Government work, under agreement between the Federal Government and the State, and not under contract, directly or indirectly, with private contractors, insuring to convicts so employed standard hours and wages. This plan promises both opportunity of social rehabilitation to the men, and of added production of needed war goods.

The Thorn in the Flesh

TEXT—II Cor. 12:7, R. V. "There was given to me a thorn in the flesh, a messenger of Satan to buffet me, that I should not be exalted overmuch."

WHOEVER can read the twelfth chapter of Second Corinthians, from the first verse to the ninth, without a tug at the depths of his affections, has a heart of stone. The apostle begins by averring that if any man has a right to glory in intimate and wondrous revelations of God he is that man. In proof of this he recites his experience, which is of an unusual character. He says that he was caught up even to the third heaven; that he glimpsed paradise; that he heard the conversation in the very holy of holies, unspeakable words that were not lawful for man to utter. And then, immediately after this recital of unspeakable glories and spiritual ecstasies, he refers to a very great infirmity. He speaks of it as "a thorn in the flesh," acknowledges that he prayed the Lord Christ thrice that it might depart from him, and that the prayer was not answered in the way he had expected, but that he was given strength to endure it.

On the surface, this account of the apostle's spiritual exaltation and his source of great distress almost in the same breath is like the strains of some entrancing harmony followed straightway by crash of strident discord. It is like the description of Naaman, commander-in-chief of all the Syrian army, honored by his king, loved by his servants, idolized by men, covered with jewels and medals, but withal a leper. It is like my one-time host of many years ago taking me over his large estate, and with a sweeping gesture exclaiming, "I own as far as you can see in two directions," and then a few minutes later sadly saying, "My only child is a helpless invalid." It is like—why, this experience of the apostle's is like yours and mine. On the one hand the glory, the exaltation, the beauty, the sweetness, the love; on the other the deep anxiety, the suffering, the harassing hindrances that meet us at every turn.

"There was given me," writes Paul, "a thorn in the flesh, that I might not be exalted overmuch." Look for a moment at this expression. Paul's thorn in the flesh was more than a thorn. The word in the original is stronger than in the translation. Literally it is "stake" or "pale." And the reference is to one of those frightful instruments of torture on which, in a cruel age, martyrs were impaled midst unspeakable horror. So, whatever this experience was, whatever the nature of the infirmity, it was greater than a thorn piercing the flesh; it resembled more a strong and terrible stake, sharp-pointed, and driven into the quivering flesh and left there to torture the poor victim for hours and days.

IT is interesting to know the opinion of eminent Bible scholars as to the nature of the infirmity to which Paul refers in this figure of a "thorn in the flesh." Bishop Lightfoot was of the opinion that Paul's thorn in the flesh was epilepsy. He reasons that in the course of his work he was seized with an attack of an epileptic nature which for the time completely incapacitated him for active service. It is a well-known fact that some of the great characters of history were afflicted with this disease. Julius Cæsar was, likewise Petrarch, Peter the Great, and Napoleon. This is the conjecture of Bishop Lightfoot—that Paul's thorn in the flesh was epilepsy.

Sir William Ramsay, perhaps the most eminent modern authority on the life of Paul, and the author of a half-dozen books upon the life career of that great apostle, is of the opinion that his thorn in the flesh was malarial fever. He makes a case for this by a very ingenious interpretation of a reference in Galatians, and instances the fact that malaria prevails to this day in a portion of the country traversed by Paul in Galatia.

Most interesting of all is Canon Farrar's belief that Paul's thorn in the flesh was ophthalmia, an affection of the eyes; and he supports his belief by an interesting, if not convincing, argument. For instance, in Galatians Paul refers to an infirmity of the flesh and bears the Galatian Christians witness that if possible they would have plucked out their eyes and given them to him. Farrar also calls attention to the expression which Paul uses in another portion of the Galatian letter, "Ye see in what large letters I write to you with my own hand." This seems to be the only letter he wrote himself; others he dictated to an amanuensis. So in this one letter, written by his own hands, he made the letters large; indeed had to make them that way because of his poor eyesight. Still again, Farrar explains Paul's indignant answer to the high priest and his apology that "he had not recognized the speaker to have been the high priest." Because his vision was blurred, he did not see the white-robed figure; hence his indignant rejoinder, the rebuke, and his apology which followed.

Whether the thorn in the flesh was epilepsy or fever, or a very grievous disease of the eyes, there is no gainsaying that it was an infirmity which greatly harassed and hindered the apostle. So great was his suffering that he finally brought his burden in simple yet agonizing prayer to the Lord. There is something very beautiful and exquisitely tender in his account of the prayer thrice offered that this infirmity might depart. "Observe how closely he followed the example of Jesus in the garden of Gethsemane. In the midst of that terrible struggle, it is recorded that Jesus prayed thrice that the cup might pass; and although the cup did not pass, he was strengthened by divine power to drain it to the dregs. Thus it was with Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ. He prayed thrice that this thorn in the flesh might be removed. This incident is a flashlight upon the great subject of prayer. In his agony and dilemma, this great soul communed with his Lord: told him of the thorn in the flesh and the suffering it entailed, and prayed that it might be removed. It is worthy of remark that Paul directs his prayer for the thorn's removal to Jesus Christ himself. Telling Christ what is in our hearts is a noble example of prayer life. God seems so awful, so almighty, so far away; but the gentle Jesus seems close by, the "daysman" or "umpire" of Job, the "mediator" of Paul, the Christ of every soul who trusts in him.

PAUL prayed for the thorn's removal, but it was not removed. The Bible is full of records of what seem to be "unanswered prayers." Moses prayed to enter the Promised Land, but he died on top of Mount Pisgah. King David prayed for the recovery of his child, but the child died. In the twenty-second Psalm the author cries, "O my God, I cry in the daytime, but thou answerest not; and in the night season, and am not silent." God did not answer Paul's petition. He did answer Paul. And it was a great answer: "My grace is sufficient for thee." "Grace"—here is a word we meet constantly in the New Testament. What does the word mean? It means God's favor which he bestows upon us as only he can do. It denotes power. It signifies strength. "My grace is sufficient for thee." That thorn in the flesh, whatever it was, had to remain. Paul carried it with him until the end of his earthly journey, but God gave him strength to bear it, grace to withstand it, power to overcome it. It is often so with us and our prayers. God answers us and not our petitions. As Henry Ward Beecher once put it: "A woman prays for patience, and the Lord sends her a green cook. That is, we pray for a thing and God gives us a chance."

"My grace is sufficient for thee." Observe that Paul is assured that God's grace is sufficient for him, not shall be. And that is true in respect to every one of us. His grace is sufficient if we will rest on the Everlasting Arms, if we only trust and obey. His grace is sufficient for us at this present moment if we only believe it, if we are but willing to test it out. God's promises are in the present tense. It is not necessary to go to heaven to know God. We need not rest upon the promise that he will do so-and-so, but rest upon him now and here. In the larger reaches Paul's prayer was answered—grandly answered. The thorn in the flesh remained, but he was enabled to bear it.

Now the teaching of this eloquent chapter is that Paul's greatest strength came from his most obvious weakness. The inference from this thorn-in-the-flesh experience is that Paul was a stronger character with this thorn than without it. Paul here as much as says, "I am glad for my sorrow. It is a means of growth. It is a good, not an evil."

My brethren, many of us have gone to the heavenly Father with petitions for the removal of a thorn in the flesh, and it is still there. Yet withal, if we have prayed in simple and sincere faith we have made a great discovery: his grace is sufficient for us. He heard us after all. He hears us now. No unanswered prayers, no ungranted petitions, no fruitless supplications, ever rise from penitent hearts. God hears, God heeds, and lo, he answers us always.

I AM loath to believe that Paul let his thoughts rest often upon his "thorn" after his third petition. Therefore he forgot the thorn in contemplation of God's grace. And out of his meditation on the grace of God, he labored early and late for the salvation of the world. Paul's labors for the salvation of the world helped him to overcome his infirmity. Concern for the welfare of others is a wonderful cure for sorrow.

John Bright told of a suggestion that was made to him when his young wife died and while her lifeless form was still in his home. He was in the depths of grief, almost of despair, for the light and sunshine of his home had been extinguished. His friend, Richard Cobden, called and spoke words of sympathy. After a little while he looked up and said, "There are thousands of homes in England at this moment where wives, mothers, and children are dying of hunger. Now when the first paroxysm of your grief is past I would advise you to come with me and we will never rest till the Corn Law is repealed." Bright accepted the invitation and never ceased to labor hard in behalf of the resolution which the two had made; and in so doing forgot his own grief and loneliness.

Dr. Gerould of Cleveland, Ohio, lost his three children in one year. Having none of his own on whom to lavish his thought and love and substance, he decided to do what he could to aid other children who were in need. He was always helping young people through school and college. A young girl became a Christian and was driven away from her home. Dr. Gerould sent her to Bethany College, West Virginia. He built a home in Hiram, Ohio, for young women who were unable to pay their way through college. He had it in his heart to do still larger things when the Lord called him higher. Dr. Gerould's labors in behalf of young people kept him young, ennobled his life, and filled him with unspeakable joy.

IT takes most of us about a lifetime here, in this present world, to get well enough acquainted with our best friends to enable us to know them. Many sad disappointments have come to us through the betrayal of the trust we have placed in those whom we thought we could depend upon. On the other hand, there are those who have proved to be dependable, and once we find them we are loath to give them up. Our experience in life has been much sweeter, our trials much more easily borne, our burdens much lighter, all because we had those to whom we could go for help and sympathy.

When at last the parting comes, our attachment has grown so strong that we are caused to wonder if, in the future life, we shall be permitted to recognize these friends of earth. Many people today are puzzled over this question, and are in need of light. We believe that we may look for this light to that never-failing source, the Word of God. Paul said, "But then shall I know even as also I am known." John, the beloved disciple, has this to say: "We shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." Yet this does not fully explain the point in question.

Christ said: "And this is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." Again: "I know my sheep, and am known of mine."

Christ said to Thomas, "Reach hither thy finger and behold my hands, and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side, and be not faithless, but believing." Again, speaking to his disciples: "Behold my hands and my feet; handle me, and see that it is I myself; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have." On another occasion, when the disciples had fished all night catching nothing, Jesus appeared on the shore of the lake, prepared breakfast and ate with them.

These incidents, all occurring after Christ was resurrected, have quite a significance with reference to this subject. Christ, the firstfruits of the resurrection, is the sample or pattern of all that shall follow. He desired his disciples to recognize their risen Lord, and asked them to examine him carefully, even calling their attention to the marks of his identity in his hands and feet.

In the first resurrection, the righteous come forth just as they fell asleep, except that they are immortal, and hence have the freshness of youth. It is then the blessed privilege of the redeemed to "grow up" to the fullness of the stature of Christ. Redemption would not seem complete if there were lacking the ability to recognize each other, which, as we recall the experiences of the past, would enable us better to appreciate the fullness of redemption.

The Inhibitions of the Spirit

SUNDAY, September 15. Acts 16:7. "They assayed to go into Bithynia; and the spirit of Jesus suffered them not." They had what the Friends so suggestively call "a stop in the mind." Their thought had no freedom along that road. The path was blocked. They were confronted by an invisible Antagonist. Their affirmative was frustrated by the divine negative. A providential "No" came sounding along the road. They assayed to go into Bithynia, but the Guide into all truth interposed, and their plans had to be laid aside. And, therefore, we say that they heard a voice saying, "Behold, I set before thee a closed door!" The Spirit sometimes guides us by a closed door.

Now it needs a very discerning sense to apprehend and appreciate the divine inhibitions. When we essay to go into Bithynia our desire to go is often very clamorous, and in the deafening noise the still small voice is apt to be drowned. Our desires are often the ministers of the divine will. But they must be kept quiet lest they hustle us into premature action before the final guidance of the Lord has been given. And our spiritual senses need to be kept very refined, if we are to readily apprehend the assents and the dissents of the Spirit. These senses are easily dulled. The neglect of a few days exposes them to a very subtle destructiveness. To force our judgments is to impair them: it is like forcing the needle of a compass by some extraneous influence. The instrument is perverted, and all its registers are untrue. And so it is that the apostle urges us to have our spiritual senses "exercised to discern": and this is done by ceaseless prayer, and by constant watching, and by ready obedience to God's revealed will.

And, for a last word, it is surely well worth noticing that the Spirit which closed the way to Bithynia opened the way to Europe! Bithynia was inhibited: then came a voice from Macedonia. And that is often the way of the Lord. The inhibition seems to be contracting our ministry, but it brings our feet into a large place. We lose our own way; we find a better. The better sphere is not always a larger sphere in the sense of material scale and public honor. It may be even less extensive, but it will be more intensive. At any rate God's Europe is always better than our Bithynia. When the Lord closes one door he opens another, and when we pass through the one door we shall find that he has prepared a place for us, and all things are ready.

Be Ye Tender-Hearted

MONDAY, September 16. Eph. 4:32. "Be ye kind to one another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." Next to the blessing of a pure heart is the blessing of a tender heart. Not all pure hearts are tender, and not all tender hearts are pure; but a heart that is filled with the love of God must be both pure and tender. Absolutely the worst thing in the world is an impure heart, and the next worst thing is a hard heart. Moses says that Pharaoh hardened his heart, and again he affirms that God hardened Pharaoh's heart. The contradiction is only apparent. Pharaoh set his will against the will of God, and there is a law of God, immutable as any law of nature, by which the heart that excludes God grows obdurate. Saints grow in grace, sinners grow in disgrace. The pure heart grows purer, and the impure heart more impure. The tender heart grows more tender, and the hard heart hardens as the days go by. The same fire that melts ore hardens clay.

The world tends to make hearts hard. The multitude of frauds, the abuse of confidence, the violence done to friendship, the very frequency of appeals to sympathy—these are the things which tend to render us less sensitive to the thought and sight of suffering. But nothing so certainly sears the heart as broken promises, unfulfilled vows, unredeemed pledges to God. What can counteract these influences? What can we do to keep our hearts tender, to keep our souls sensitive? First, we can pray to the Lamb of God. "Lamb of God, calm my perturbed spirit!" cried an English preacher under circumstances of great provocation. Then we can exercise mercy in speech and act. We can curb our sharp tongues and train our sharp tempers. We can guard the gates of speech against undue severity. Moreover, we can avail ourselves of every opportunity to contemplate the scene in sight of which the hardest heart grows tender—the death of Christ, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God. Thackeray, speaking of the death of George III, writes: "Hush, strife and quarrel, over this solemn scene." If the pall of an earthly monarch exercises a subduing power, a restraining influence, what should not the effect be upon us as we look at the Cross of Christ? Looking at him, who was both pure-hearted and tender-hearted, we grow like him.

Two Occupations

TUESDAY, September 17. Luke 14:18, 19, 20. "I pray thee have me excused . . . I cannot come." The persons who declined the call of God to attend his supper were not honest in their excuses. They had not been asked to give up their secular callings and engagements. Men had raised cattle, bought lands, and married before them, and have continued to do so since, without renouncing God and the Church and neglecting their souls. The Father's business was not intended to interfere, and did not interfere, with their profession, but they made their ordinary occupation interfere with divine calling.

We pray in the Lord's Prayer: "Hallowed be thy name; thy kingdom come; thy will be done"—that refers to the Father's business. We proceed: "Give us this day our daily bread"—that refers to our own business. Our business is to be attended to while we are doing the Father's business. If we engage in a calling which will not allow us to hallow God's name and to do his will—a calling which is either ungodly in character or leads to ungodliness, or places certain unholy restraints upon us, binding our tongues against speaking the truth or thwarting the righteous and gracious purposes of God regarding ourselves and others, if we become engrossed with money-getting, the acquisition of learning and fame—we have put asunder what God has joined together. Then a grievous dilemma occurs: God says: "Come to church"; we say: "I cannot afford the time." God says: "Bring up your children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord!" we say: "I am too busy making a living for them." God says: "Live soberly!" we reply: "I cannot while I am in my business." God says: "Do something for helping convert the heathen!" we answer: "I need my money for an investment." God says: "Choose another calling then!" we reply: "I have no confidence in any other." Thus excuses are multiplied and the separation between our earthly and our heavenly calling becomes complete. What a pity!

Lower and Higher

WEDNESDAY, September 18. Heb. 1:4. "Being made so much better than the angels." David says of the glory of manhood, "Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels," but Paul says, "Let all the angels of God worship the Christ." The angels are ministering spirits to those whom Christ came to redeem, but Christ is the express image of God's person and at the right hand of the Majesty on high, swaying the scepter of righteousness. What an infinite distance there is between being a little lower than the angels and being Creator and Ruler over all worlds and peoples! Our Lord is in vast contrast with men and angels who are to worship him.

To which of the angels did he ever say, "Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee," or, "Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever," or, "Sit on my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool?" Christ did not die for angels but for men; therefore he took our nature. All his creations are but the garments of the Lord.

Angels are to minister to the heirs of him who is the Light of Life, the very God. Kiss the Son, love the Son, worship the Son, and you will know the Father. Man made a little lower than the angels shall be advanced through Christ, taking his nature to the higher altitudes of being crowned with glory and honor forever. Our Lord's prayer for the glory he had with the Father was the right of Sonship and the right to redeem man, whose salvation is completed or made perfect through suffering, wherefore he is not ashamed to call us brethren. Eternity in Our Hearts

THURSDAY, September 19. Eccles. 3:11. "He hath set eternity in our heart." Human life on earth is very brief and very frail. There are trees in California, still living, which are more than three thousand years old. How helpless we are in the grasp of law, in the grasp of such a force, for instance, as gravitation or electricity! How slow our movements, compared with light! There is a view of life which makes us very humble. "What is man that thou art mindful of him?" But there is another view of life. Humanity is greater than it seems. Our thoughts can fly more swiftly than light. There is an inner man who lives longer than California trees. We are not so helpless in the grasp of law as appears at first sight. That radiant star seems quite to overawe its human observer, but the star has not eternity in its heart. Man has in his heart an affinity for God, a sense of God. Let this sense be developed and it becomes the vital principle of a union with God such as was his who said, "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me."

An aged woman who lives alone said to her pastor who asked her if her solitude was a trial to her faith, "Oh, no; God often visits me. There are times when I feel as Moses felt when he stood on holy ground and saw the passing glory of the Lord." With all the innate and cultivated weaknesses of humanity, there is within us an inextinguishable instinct of what may be called illimitability. We are not like beasts that perish without hope. Our very lack of satisfaction in earth is proof that we were born to a destiny beyond the earth. Our desires exceed the power of earth to minister to them. Our souls are like the nestlings of eagles—we feel the inward call of a boundless destiny.

The Two Viewpoints

FRIDAY, September 20. James 4:13, 15. "Go to now, ye that say, Today or tomorrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain. . . . For that ye ought to say, If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this or that." The conflict between men's secular and spiritual callings is not settled either by an ascetic form of life or by an atheistic rejection of religion. There has been a tendency, fostered by men who meant to be quite holy and to serve God with an undivided heart, to pronounce every secular occupation unholy and a hindrance to true religion. Artisans, merchants, peasants, soldiers, officers of the state, etc., have been induced to give up their professions, in order to give themselves up entirely to holy pursuits. Under this teaching honest labor will ever be at a serious disadvantage, and if consistently carried out and universally applied, this teaching would result in the social and economic wreckage of the human race. Even in the limited extent to which it was applied at times it has proved disastrous to the legitimate temporal interests of mankind: it has permitted many a strong arm and many a fine head to decay in a one-sided endeavor that was taken up in a mistaken zeal for godliness.

The opposite extreme is seen in the atheistic view of labor, which has renounced all interest in heaven, declaring that heaven should be left to angels and dicker birds; which seeks to set up a heaven for itself in this world, devotes its Sundays to picnics, dancing and carousing, regards the Church as a most tedious place, church organizations as an incubus on society, and Christian pastors as loafers in holy garb. Where this tendency prevails, man's spiritual interests are at a hopeless disadvantage. The soul, if its existence is still granted, is severed from its divine Rest-Giver, Instructor, and Comforter.

The proper thing to do is to combine secular enterprise with a spirit of true religion, to work and to pray, submitting all our labor to the direction of Providence and asking God to bless it. W. H. T. D.

His Kindness

SATURDAY, September 21. Isa. 54:10. "The mountains shall depart and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, saith the Lord, who hath mercy on thee." The mountains symbolize the almightiness of God, inspiring us to sing, "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, whence cometh my help." "God is our refuge and strength." The mountains reveal the treasures embosomed in the valleys. Here are sample gems of coal, iron, gold and silver, which were buried deep below. Their lofty grandeur and sublime magnificence inspire the artist and the worshiper. Their beauty awakens beauty in character and excites aspirations after the holiness of the Highest.

Convulsions in nature once lifted the mountain ranges into view; so the agony of the Saviour on Calvary revealed the gems of love and mercy in the heart of the Infinite.

But at last the mountains shall depart, when the earth will melt with fervent heat; but God's mountains of refuge and sympathy will never depart from his children. What are called by men "the eternal mountains" one day will fall, but "My loving kindness will never cease from thee. My love outlasts all changes in nature, all the ages of time, and all the cycles of eternity."

People Help in Harvest

A STRANGER going into any one of hundreds of towns in the Middle West any day during the grain harvest this past summer would have found the villages deserted, the banks, stores, shops closed, and the men out in the country helping the farmer save his crops to feed the soldiers and citizens and win the war. The women also left town to go out and help their sisters on the farm to cook meals for the great army of harvesters. The farmers have suffered the loss of the young men who have gone into the country's service in camp and factory. In this shortage of help the government has called on the farmers to raise more crops, to plant a larger acreage, to till with greater intensity and produce a larger harvest, and right wisely and patriotically have they responded to the call. This response would have been impossible if the village and city men and women of all callings had not rushed out into the country and aided in saving the abundant harvests. During the harvesting of more than nine and a half million acres of wheat in Kansas 40,000 town people helped and saved the crop. Kansas City alone furnished 10,000 farm hands. In Indiana twenty-four towns enlisted 9,000 harvest hands for the wheat and oats. Illinois has more than 50,000 workers in sixty counties registered for the harvest. In one of the cities of the Middle West the mayor went out into the country and drove the reaper, while the members of the board of public works shocked the grain. In a county seat in South Dakota the parties went to the court house to try a case before Judge Dillman of the Twelfth Circuit, and learned he was out at his own farm working in the harvest field. They went out to his place and the judge took the sheaves of grain he was shocking and fenced off a court room, took one for his "bench" and tried the case in record time in satisfaction to at least one of the parties concerned, and then went back to the job of winning the war, which he counted in harvest time as important as administering justice. The fields in the mental and spiritual realm are dead ripe and are spoiling for want of reapers. A shortage of farm hands in harvest, and the call for other laborers to help them, is thus mentioned by Christ: "The harvest truly is plentiful, but the laborers are few; pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth laborers into his harvest." (Matt. 9:37, 38.)

Bridge Over Suez Canal

IT has just been announced that a suspension bridge has been swung over the Suez Canal, and that railroad communication between Cairo and Jerusalem is to be opened. A canal from the Nile to the Red Sea was one of the engineering feats of antiquity planned by Rameses II, again undertaken by Darius I and completed by the Ptolemies. The Suez Canal is not a modern institution. Twenty-four hundred years ago there was a canal dug between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, which remained open for the use of small ships, when it fell into disuse. The present Suez Canal was built without locks, wards eased the little steamer up to the cow whale. The harpoon was driven home, and the fight was on. For ten miles the cow towed the steamer through the sea. Then, tired, she stopped. The steamer approached within ten feet, and Boatswain Hanson fired the lance into a vital spot. Half an hour later the cow was dead. Some of the men were left in a skiff to guard the prize, while the rest went back after the bull. They found him in the same place. With perfect aim Hanson hurled the part of the bees to manufacture one pound of the comb as it does to make one pound of honey. Hence the government is asking those raising bees to take the honey from the comb by a centrifugal process, and use the same wax comb again, thereby increasing the honey-making power of each hive. The Jews had an abundance of honey. It was made by the wild bees in the woods, generally in hollow trees. There is this account of the eating of honey by our Lord after his resurrection: "And they gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of an honeycomb." (Luke 24:42.)

gates, reservoirs or pumping engines. The two seas are so nearly on a level that the waters of each filled the canal. How valuable the new bridge will be, just at the time when the Allies occupy Palestine! The children of Israel did not have a bridge over the Suez Canal to get from Egypt to Arabia. The Lord opened a path in the bed of the Red Sea and let them over and away from their oppressors. This is the account: "And the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground; and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand, and on their left." (Ex. 14:22.)

Captures Two Whales

CAPTAIN SAMUEL EDWARDS of East Hampton, Long Island, was out fishing and saw two whales basking in the sun only a quarter of a mile off the East Hampton shore. The cow was sixty feet long, and the bull 100 feet. The captain rushed his motor boat to the land and got eleven men, a harpoon, lance, gun and rope. His father was an old whaler and he knew what equipment was necessary. Returning Ed-harpoon into him. The bull tore off to sea, dragging the steamer like a toy in his wake. After he had gone twenty miles at a terrific speed he stopped, and Captain Edwards drove the lance home. Maddened by the mortal wound the giant bull churned the water into foam. For two hours he floundered and fought in his death agonies, and twice his tail, which could so easily have crushed the boat, barely touched its stern. After his death his body was lashed to that of the cow and they were towed around Montauk Point to Promised Land. It is said that a whale is worth the price of an ordinary Long Island farm, and the two will net $15,000. The whale has this notice in the story of the creation in the first chapter of the Bible: "And God created great whales." (Gen. 1:21.)

Less Comb, More Honey

IN the determination to conserve the food supply, and especially sweets, the Department of Agriculture is now urging the raising of more bees and the production of more honey. It has been found by experiment that it requires twenty times as much energy on the not only answer the call of their country but also this divine call: "Fight the good fight of faith." (1 Tim. 6:12.)

Await Conductor's Wedding

THE street car system of Yonkers, N. Y., became a party to a romance by furnishing a conductor for the groom and a passenger for the bride. The conductor dashed with Miss Mary Betley into the City Hall at the end of his run in Yonkers and shortly dashed out again with his bride to make the return trip as a honeymoon journey. The passengers did not understand why they waited. Nothing is more out of place than a freak marriage; one in the lion's cage at the circus, in the play at the theater; one on a dare or bet. So many turn out not to be jokes, but tragedies. The Jews never witnessed such a parody on marriage as the three minutes' wait of the street car. They had a feast and pomp and ceremony, as will be seen by this incident: "And he saith unto him, Friend, how camest thou in hither not having a wedding garment? And he was speechless." (Matt. 22:12.)

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them Into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

SHE was all of five years old, dear neighbors—the busy war-worker I am going to tell you about—and she was as plump as a butter-ball. Her head was a mass of tousled brown curls. Her cheeks were flaming poppies. Her deep-set brown eyes, a-twinkle with mischief, looked out on a world she was glad to be alive in.

She sat on the beach, in the sunshine, knitting heavily on the bulkiest gray muffler any soldier or sailor boy ever aspired to: the nice, long, woolly kind you can wrap around twice and tie in the back. And she laughed to herself as she knitted.

I stood looking down at her—little joyous atom of humanity doing her splendid bit to alleviate the anguish of a world—and something overwhelmed me, something between tears and laughter. But the laughter triumphed. She was so droll sitting there! Her knitting-needles were long and business-like; almost as tall as herself. And in those dimpled, chubby little hands they looked (somehow) like telegraph poles.

Furthermore, there was something odd about the way she was knitting. She got results. The firm, even muffler was proof of that. Yet, there was something queer—

"Show me," I begged at last, dropping down beside her and trying not to laugh.

Her eagerness proved that war-workers are the same the country over. Her brown eyes lighted; her red lips parted; she breathed quickly.

"This way—"

Her tousled brown head bent once more over her work.

I looked on respectfully, warned by the earnestness of that little face (the well known expression of the expert war-knitter) that this was no time for levity.

HER dimpled hands clutched the needles more firmly. She gave the yarn a business-like shake. And the knitting proceeded in the same queer fashion. For a moment I was at a loss to understand. And then suddenly it all became clear to me. Instead of throwing the thread over the needle with her right forefinger—a Herculean task which her small pink finger could never have hoped to accomplish—she (nothing daunted) had surmounted this difficulty in the way of serving her country by grabbing the yarn in a determined right fist and placing it over the needle bodily, after which it was a simple matter to hook it off.

The laugh began deep down in me somewhere, and welled up in a tide that swept me before it. Tumbling Elizabeth over on the sand, I tousled her until her shrieks of laughter rang out. Then, rolling her up into a sitting position again, with her precious needles safe in her two fists, I left her working there and smiling at me rosily while I hurried away to my typewriter to tell you all about it and to make a comradely suggestion.

I earnestly suggest that we—you and I—recruit all the restless little folk in our respective villages and fill their eager hands with war-work.

This work can be light. It need not be, like Elizabeth's, a great muffler knitted on telegraph poles. It can be a few rows of a sock, or the making of scrap-books for sick soldiers, or joining a troop of Boy Scouts, or cutting out magazine jokes to slip into letters for France, or writing to some one overseas, or helping form a Junior Red Cross Chapter. It can even be something simpler and homier; just a kindness shown to a neighbor.

What matters is that the children be given their war ideals—their notions of service—as we have ours. They are living this war almost as intensely as we. We cannot shut them out of it, if we would. But we can provide them with a wholesome outlet for the emotional strain of it all.

That this need is being recognized by educators in charge of large centers for children is proven by the following adventure sent in by a Settlement Worker of New York City:

Children and the War

I want to tell you about the fine spirit I found last winter among the children in one of the New York Settlement Houses where I was a worker. The war was keenly realized by all, down to the slightest tot; and many a time the whole-hearted Americanism of these children moved me deeply. At first, the solemnity of their pinched little faces frightened me. I recalled what I had heard: that physicians were deploring the nervous tensiety and unrest of children in these war times; and I made up my mind that I would do all I could for those little people.

With the aid of other workers, I got up patriotic clubs and sings, knitting classes. Thrift Stamp societies, and every other kind of Juvenile War Service I knew about. The result was amazing. Its first effect was a sudden increase in attendance. Across our worn doorstep came all nationalities, welded by their loyalty to Uncle Sam into an eager, helpful little band of patriots. Before long the girls were deep in the throes of the knitting fever and had learned how to make eye-bandages and wash-cloths. The boys were selling Thrift Stamps; and some of them were cooperating on a letter to a sailor, expressing the hope that he would "baste the face" of the enemy, and return safely. One poorly-dressed little Italian lad, whose fingers were stiff with the cold, proudly showed me a partly knitted scarf as proof that he was "doing his bit." And both girls and boys pursued me with tickets for the different patriotic entertainments they were getting up at their schools.

All this worked a complete change in the children. Wherever there was a group gathered, you would hear bright talk of the amateur war-play they were planning, an exchange of comical experiences in selling Thrift Stamps, or (among the little girls) Red Cross gossip over busy knitting-needles. Could the alarmed neurologists have seen the shining faces of those children as they gathered around the piano every night to sing patriotic songs, they would have cheered up, I am sure. War is not so grim and terrible to children, if their little hands and minds are kept busy with war service. The greatest wrong we can do them is to discuss the harrowing phases of the war in their hearing, and work for the soldiers in their sight, then tell them to "run away and play." The parents who do this can expect their children to be morbid and nervous while this war lasts.

L. H. M.

That letter, Adventurers, impressed me so deeply that I fell to wondering if it might not contain a pretty earnest message for all of us. Those of us who have no children in our homes, care enough about the well-being of our neighbors' children to watch the effect of the war on them and to do all in our power to keep them happy and wholesome and sane.

THERE are many ways of doing this. Following is the account of how one older girl, in a community where the girls were restless and quarrelsome, raised the tone of the group.

Making Girls Into Girl Scouts

I have enjoyed so much reading others' Adventures in Neighboring, that I thought I would let you know of my experience.

I am Captain of a troop of Girl Scouts. I have thirty-two girls enrolled. And never was a Troop of Girl Scouts more needed by a neighborhood. These girls, before they were Scouts, were quarreling among themselves. They all wanted to do something for the war, but they didn't know how to work together. When my Troop was first organized, I had a hard time getting the girls to be sisters. One little girl would have an ill thought against another, and so on. But at last I have won. I found that love was the one great thing they needed, so I tried to encourage this in them. Their ages run from twelve to eighteen, and you'd think this would keep them from being congenial; but it has not. After only five weeks of association together, they are all good comrades; and a nicer crowd of girls you could not find anywhere. They all love one another, and besides, they are always on the lookout for a chance to help some one in the neighborhood. Without this organization, with its high ideals, these girls would have been quarrelsome and of no help in the war. Now they are doing their bit. And the whole neighborhood seems different. I hope this experience of mine will be a help to some one.

To my way of thinking, that little adventure is stunning. If every Amer-

Knowledge is always knocking at the door of a man's life and saying: "Let me in!"

A man cannot always put his best foot foremost—the other foot will insist upon having its turn.

God pity the man who carries over the cares of yesterday and borrows the burdens of tomorrow to add to the load of today.

ican community would see to it that its young girls were banded together in this inspiring way, the effect on our national life would be incalculable.

OUR next adventure took place before this war began; but I am using it because I believe it offers a solution of a problem confronting us today: the problem of banding together the older boys and girls. For them, there exists no patriotic organization. The boys are beyond the Boy Scout age; the girls too old for the Girl Scout. And yet something is needed—in half the towns in the United States—to bring these war-restless, big boys and girls together in a wholesome and helpful way. If any of you have a better solution than the following to offer, do send it to me, so that we might consider it too.

A Club for Older Boys and Girls

I told you recently, Christian Herald Neighbors, of the club formed to establish confidence between mothers and their small boys, and of the boy whom we all learned to love. I would like now to tell you of one formed three years later which was the outgrowth of the club for little boys.

One day in early winter, the mother of the boy who had been helped came to me with tears in her eyes, and said: "Oh, can't you do something to help save my older boy? You took my Glenn when we could do nothing with him. He would stay in pool rooms and places that were demoralizing, but since he has belonged to that little club, there hasn't been a night that he hasn't come to me before going to bed. We talk awhile; then he puts his arms around me, gives me a kiss, and leaves with a smile on his face. Now please do something to help his older brother, for he has taken to drink and is staying out nights. I have been talking with him, and he says: 'Mother, there is no place to go, except to dances, pool rooms or places where you wouldn't be seen. The people in this town do not seem to care for the young people. If they did, we would not be such a tough set. If there were some good place to go, we wouldn't frequent the bad places.'" That mother and I talked and planned, finally deciding to get the mothers together and see what could be done. Ten of the mothers met at my house. We put the matter before them, and this was the plan worked out: that we send invitations to all the young people to spend an evening in my home. This was done, and the young people came. We furnished entertainment, helping them to have a pleasant time. They then organized a club which they called "Lend a Hand," using for their motto Edward Everett Hale's beautiful verse:

"Look upward, not downward.
"Look outward, not inward;
"Look forward, not backward,
"And lend a hand."

They met once a week, and at least two of the mothers attended each gathering. Four young people were a committee to furnish a program, which consisted of readings, music and games. Four others were a committee on refreshments. In this way they would have several meetings during the week, to practice their music: which made it pleasant for them.

The evening of their gathering, there would be at least forty young people present, and often many more. They met at the different homes, and in this way the older people became acquainted with the younger and grew to take an interest in them. The club kept its interest for more than two years, then Glenn and his older brother, with their parents, moved to California. Before going, the older brother came to say good-by to me. He said: "Lend a Hand has made a different man of me, and I want to thank you for what you have done for my brother and myself." That young man has now gone as a soldier to France. C. S. C.

Such a club, if started today, would, of course include a patriotic aim, and its meetings would occasionally be given at the Red Cross workrooms, where the girls could sort and pack and the boys nail the boxes for shipment.

Due to the length of this splendid adventure, our Forum has been crowded out; but there will be a big one next time to make up for it.

Meantime, fellow Adventurers, my warmest good wishes to you until another fortnight has rolled around!

The Pool of Bethesda

WHO of us but at the mention of this pool thinks at once of the impotent man, who after 38 years of disappointment because of his inability to be first in the water following the visit of the angel, found himself on a certain Sabbath in the presence of One greater than the angel, at whose word he received strength to arise and walk? Often we pray that his power may heal our own impotence of flesh or spirit.

The identity of the pool is not certainly known, there being seven pools and cisterns which various authorities consider the possible Bethesda, but the weight of tradition is in favor of the deep pool, which is here shown, to the north of the former temple enclosure, although its dimensions mark it rather a reservoir than a pool for the washing of sheep or the bathing of the sick. While at present the basin contains only a small pool of stagnant water, it is 360 feet long, 130 broad and 75 deep, even though partly filled with rubbish and earth. Its sides were carefully faced with small stones and those covered with plaster. At the southwest corner two high arched vaults extend back under the houses of the adjacent quarter. The northern one is 19 feet broad, the other 12 feet and they are known to extend over 100 feet under ground. Both are choked with earth. They are probably parts of the aqueduct system which fed the reservoir, ancient Jerusalem having been better supplied with good water than the present city. It is conjectured that the trenches were filled up by Titus when he was constructing the great embankments against the walls of Jerusalem by means of which he finally took the city after his long siege had reduced it to a sepulchre of dying men.

The view of the pool chosen by the artist is taken from the street leading to the great mosque. The many domed houses are typical of Jewish architecture in a region where stone was more easily obtained than timber. The tower on the right is a minaret within the enclosure of the Mosque of Omar and the ruins beneath are thought to be the broken remnants of the Tower of Antonia wrecked by Titus.

Taking the Gospel to the Jews

IT has usually been rather hazardous to take the Gospel to the Jews, but those members of the outdoor evangelistic staff of the National Bible Institute in New York are meeting with radically different treatment in these stirring days than those which former experiences have led them to expect. Up in the Bronx, an auto truck has been placed at the disposal of Mr. Thomas E. Little, superintendent of the Institute's Bronx Gospel Hall, and the first midday meeting from this truck was remarkable. After the expiration of an hour and a half, two of the Jews went to the hall, where both later surrendered to Jesus Christ. One of them said: "If you people come over here because you love the Jews, and keep so calm and sweet, there must be something real to keep you so sweet."

At another outdoor evangelistic meeting for Jews, addressed by Mr. Morris Maisel, one of the members of the outdoor staff of the Institute and formerly a Hebrew teacher in the Jewish schools of the Bronx, one of those present said: "I see now that you are eling to the Jewish hopes and ancient faith more than the average Jew. Why, then, are your people hated so?" He was told that this is the experience of all who are true servants of God. After a long talk, he promised thoroughly to consider the matter of giving his heart to the Lord, and gave Mr. Maisel his name and address. Another interesting outgrowth of outdoor evangelistic meetings is the opening for work in many Jewish homes. During the past few weeks, seventeen of these homes have been opened for evangelistic meetings. Wherever these prayer meetings have been held, the families have earnestly requested the workers to come again, and several of them have accepted Jesus Christ as their Messiah.

The Easiest Way in the World to Make Friends

SHE was not good looking. She dressed rather plainly. She did not sing or play and danced only fairly well. She had never traveled—in fact, had not been outside of three or four states.

But she was popular. No matter where she went she was always the center of a bright circle. She was a leader in her social set. She was at the head of several committees doing civic and social work. She was the head of the Ladies' Aid Society—and a leader in all the church affairs and her advice was always sought by leaders in every activity in which she was a member. Even her children seemed different—more refined, advanced for their age. At social gatherings of every description she was in constant demand. There were always more invitations than she could accept. She had found the way to make friends.

The Secret of Likeableness

What was the secret of her fascination? She did not seem to make any special effort to be agreeable. She was no more polished than half a dozen other women who moved in the same circle.

Why was she so universally welcomed and admired and liked? For one and only one reason. She could talk in a way that made people listen. That was the asset she had that other women of my acquaintance had not. She was wise enough to know that it is more important to be than to have. She had acquired an acquaintance with the finer things of life. That was what made her so interesting.

Never at a Loss for Words

She could discuss in an original and delightful way, but with the conviction that comes only of expert knowledge, practically every subject that came up in conversation. She had ideas, and was never at a loss for words. Whether the subject were music, art, science, history, foreign countries, literature, made no difference. She brought to each richness of a trained mind. No fact was isolated in her memory. It was always associated with other facts and opinions, and so the stream of conversation was broad and deep.

She had acquired this gift—and yet she was a busy woman. How had she done it? "All in less than five minutes a day," she admitted once when I finally cornered her, wondering how she ever found time to read—with a home and children to care for day by day and engagements almost every evening. "I joined the Mentor Association some time ago. That solved the problem of finding time to keep up with the finer things in life. I had only a common school education. I have not read very extensively. But that brings me the fruits of arduous study. Others have delved and I profit by their knowledge.

"To me it means daily pleasure. But much more! The ability I once craved to make friends I now possess. I used to be miserably shy—never knew what to say. Now I am at ease wherever I go. I have simply found the easiest way in the world to make friends."

The Mentor Association

The Mentor Association is a national institution made up of a group of men and women, now numbering more than a hundred thousand, who have determined to learn just one worthwhile thing every day. It is a wonderful idea—to learn one new thing—a really important thing—each day, instead of trying to cram their heads full and learning practically nothing worthwhile.

And it is really marvelous, the ground that can be covered in this way in just a few minutes each evening. Had I not seen an example of what can be learned, and heard the story from her own lips, I would never have believed it. All this woman's appreciation and knowledge of the great works of the big masters in all the fields of art and literature, her wonderfully interesting viewpoint on travel and science, had come from her membership in the Mentor Association—by learning one new thing each day.

What It Brings

Membership in the Mentor Association entitles you to several distinct services:

First—24 issues of "The Mentor," bringing a beautifully printed and illustrated story every two weeks, all about one subject, written by a leading authority upon that subject—300 pages during the year.

Second—600 beautiful illustrations, distributed during the year through the text of the 24 issues of "The Mentor."

Third—144 gravure or color pictures, reproduced on heavy paper, all ready for framing, in deep, rich tones that bring out all the beauty of the originals. If you bought these in an art store they would cost you from 25c to 50c each. On the back of each picture is a crisp five-minute description of the subject that is portrayed.

Fourth—Answers to any question on Art, Travel, Literature, History, Nature or Architecture, the Theatre—any subject, in fact—each answer by an authority.

Fifth—Authoritative Club Programs. Any program you may want for a club, a reading circle, a literary afternoon or evening. Your entire club program will be outlined for the year.

All Yours for About 1c a Day

One of the most surprising things about the Mentor service is its low cost, made possible by the large membership. Were this information to be prepared especially for you it would cost a great many thousands of dollars, but because the cost is distributed among many the cost to each is nominal—a little more than a cent a day! Send this Coupon Now. But you may examine "The Mentor" carefully before sending any money, and if you are entirely satisfied your membership will be immediately cancelled if you notify us within 10 days. Otherwise, send only $1.00 on receipt of bill and $1.00 a month for three months. This is a special offer and may never appear here again. You have everything to gain and nothing to lose. We have no agents.

Big Increase in Porcelain Efficiency

Half Again as Much Resistance to Current When Heated

In the high-speed, high-compression motors of today spark plugs must work in heat undreamed of a short time ago.

Yet under intense heat the porcelain insulator that once worked perfectly actually becomes a conductor of the electric current—fails to supply the explosive spark.

But science has now more than kept pace.

Experiment 3450 in the tenth year of unremitting original research work in our porcelain laboratories has produced a porcelain with half again as much resistance to current when heated.

Champion dependability takes so long a step forward that it seems well nigh inconceivable that any future motor will ever again develop heat enough to threaten short-circuiting through the porcelain insulator.

This greater dependability is yours if you merely take the pains to see that "Champion" is on the porcelain of your spark plugs as well as on the box.

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY"

REPORT OF PHILADELPHIA PROPHETIC CONFERENCE

THE unanimous judgment is that the great Philadelphia Bible Conference was the most momentous and important of its kind ever held in America, or perhaps in the world, both in numbers and significance. It was a Conference which at every session exalted Christ, and gave rich and stirring messages to His people throughout the world. There was no effort on the part of any speaker to exploit himself. From first to last, there was evidence in all that was said, that the most consecrated scholarship and reverent investigation was under divine guidance, and submissive to the leadings of the Holy Spirit. There was an entire absence of anything like radicalism, sensationalism, date-fixing, and dogmatism. The great fundamental belief of the Christian Church was discussed with a calm serenity that indicated conviction of its truth.

The speeches of the Conference will be welcomed by Christians and Bible readers everywhere, and especially by those who love the Lord Jesus Christ and believe in His promise. These addresses have been gathered under the official supervision of the Conference Executive Committee, and published by the Christian Herald in an authorized volume of 360 pages under the title of "Light on Prophecy." This step was taken by the Conference in order that the widest possible publicity might be assured for the book, as the record of the most authoritative assembly on prophecy ever held up to the present time.

The Fruits of the Christian Life

International Sunday School Lesson for September 22

Matt. 25:14-30 and 5:1-12

How Christ Rewards His Followers

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WE have been studying the principles of the Christian life during this quarter; today we turn to its fruits in the sense of its results. Does it pay to be a Christian? That is the question today's lesson sets out to answer. What reward is there for obedience, helpfulness, prayer and the study of God's Word? This is our theme. Many of our young people hold aloof from the Church of Christ because they have learned to think of Christianity in terms of renunciation and loss. When we tell them that happiness and joy lie in the Christian's path they scarcely believe us. We, their teachers, are challenged for proof. "Show me" is their watchword. They will have to see in our faces, our words and our lives that being a Christian means the truest happiness and the most lasting joy. Are we making good to them?

The Meaning of the Beatitudes

In the first edition of the Twentieth Century New Testament the word "happy" was used in place of "blessed" in the fifth of Matthew, but in the later editions "blessed" was restored. Happiness depends too much on outward circumstances; blessedness has to do only with the inner spirit. One can be blessed without any of the things that are usually deemed essential to happiness. Blessedness is the joy that consists in being something rather than in having something. It sums the qualities of mind and heart which the followers of Jesus achieve which constitute in themselves the guarantee of inner peace.

The ancient Hebrews believed that goodness must necessarily be rewarded with outward returns of wealth and success. They had some hard problems to consider, such as that raised in the story of Job. Jesus promised abundant reward "in this life" as well as in the world to come. He has better things to give than earthly riches. He rewards with deep and abiding friendships, with the inner serenity of a soul in harmony with the will of God, with a holy faith that finds a light shining in the darkest spot on earth.

Note, too, that Christ's beatitudes are more than the earth's best qualities of good morals. He does not say "blessed are the honest," though he knew that one cannot be happy in dishonesty. His blessings lie deeper in the very soul of man. The poor in spirit and the meek are blessed, he says. The world thinks that the grasping, the "hustlers," the self-assertive, are the ones who "get there," but the Master saw clearly that such miss the supreme blessings of the spirit. By meek he did not mean the supine, certainly not the wavering, but the unselfish, the teachable, those who are not opinionated but are full of confidence in God and in goodness. He blesses those that hunger and thirst after goodness, and the highest blessing he can bestow upon them is just that they shall be good; there is no greater reward in the universe. To be merciful, to be pure of heart—these are greater than gold.

"The Joy of the Lord Is Your Strength"

This beautiful message was given to Israel by the wise Nehemiah when he found that the reading of the Law resulted in sorrow and weeping among the people. How much the more is Christianity a religion of joy! Any interpretation of the teachings of Jesus which leaves Joy out is fragmentary indeed. He who is now engaged in true service is happy—ask the true teacher, the true missionary, the true Red Cross nurse. Jesus discovered the joy of service, where the ancient sages had found only drudgery and ingratitude. He discovered that giving brings greater joy than getting ever gave. He found joy in healing the sick, joy in restoring the lost and sinning son of Abraham, joy in pointing a miserable Samaritan woman to God. The joy of doing a kindness for another is the richest reward of the Christian's life, unless it be the added joy that comes from a knowledge of God's approval.

The Happiness of Right Doing and the Unhappiness of Sin

Even a little child understands the inner peace that comes from having done one's duty. Even a two-year-old baby can experience the unhappiness that comes with doing wrong. I shall never forget my little boy coming to me sobbing "Me wants to be good; me wants to be good," utterly unhappy because of an inner sense of failure. It was the beginning of the same struggle for righteousness that Paul vividly describes in Romans VII, where at the close he exclaims, "Wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me? Thank God, Jesus Christ our Lord!"

Henry Van Dyke has put into a nutshell the solution of the whole problem of self-will and obedience—"Life is divine when duty is a joy." Is it not true that one of the sublimest rewards of a life of prayer and service is this—to reach the heights where duty is joy? The finest verse in all the Revelation of heaven given unto John is this one: "And his servants shall serve him." Jesus said, "Your joy no man taketh from you." This joy is based on a vision of Jesus, it seems to me. But it finds its expression and sustenance in the services done in his name, in a life whose daily routine is transfigured by the happiness of serving God.

Happiness eludes those who pursue it, and the golden fruits they grasped for turn to apples of Sodom in their mouth.

The Reward of Enlarged Opportunities

"Thou hast been faithful in a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things." The reward of work well done is more work, greater work! The reward of abilities used is more ability, increased talents, the privilege of being bigger and more valuable to God. You can see that in the progress of Peter and John, or in the case of that talented man, St. Paul, as he grows into theologian, church-builder, pioneer in poor-relief, world evangelist.

The foolish follower of Christ is he who shirks and slacks because his place seems narrow and his lot small and hard. He forgets that Galilee gave foothold enough for the King of Glory.

God cannot endow us with more strength unless we will use the strength we have. He will not give us richer gifts until we show ourselves disposed to use the gifts we already have. To live with Christ, then, is to grow strong and capable, until we, like Paul, can do all things through him that strengthens us.

The Reward of a Contented and Loving Spirit

"I have learned," said Paul, "to be content." "In everything and in all things" he is blessed with a contented mind, untroubled by greed, and lust, and wilfulness.

The Christian learns the secret of love, "the greatest thing in the world." Is not Dr. Van Dyke right when he says that he who does not love has never truly lived? But this life of love comes to the Christian alone. It is the pearl of great price. It is the supreme reward. "I give unto them eternal life." No sacrifice of transitory things is too great, no self-denial of fleeting indulgences is worth considering, no labor and travail is too burdensome, if it leads us "to know him whom to know aright is life eternal." We can be like the apostle who could endure the loss of all things if he might thereby "gain Christ, and be found in him." Not only is life more truly ours, but death itself becomes an asset, and things to come as real and precious as things present. Christ is ours, nay rather, we are Christ's, and Christ is God's.

Marion Harland's Corner

Our Letter-Box

PREFATORY to sharing with readers a few of the many excellent things we extract daily from our mail, will dearly beloved constituents bear with me while I entreat that they try no further eyes that are tested already to their full ability, by writing in pencil what I am so anxious to read that I lay the sheet in the most glaring daylight I can command and spell out, word by word, the contents of the epistle I know will interest others as well as myself? And, please! always write on one side of the sheet, leaving the second page bare! Do not, I respectfully entreat, write with pencil or with pale ink when you can secure better means of conveying to me what I wish to read far more than you wish to put it upon paper.

Rest assured that the merest note forwarded to me by the Herald receives careful attention. Not a line passes unread. While the limitations of space make it impossible to print all, and especially when many deal with one and the same subject, none are forgotten, and each has its errand in the mission of our Comfort Corner.

THE first upon our list today reflects the desire of scores of mothers and friends who would fain minister to the wants of "our boys":

Will you be so kind as to give me a few recipes for small cakes, cookies and the like, that will keep for some weeks without getting dry or musty? Something which may be sent safely to our boys in the field and be eaten with satisfaction by them? So many delicacies are perishable that we are puzzled with what eatables to stock the boxes we love to send them. M. E. V. (New York).

Your request and the reply will be read with interest by hundreds whose hearts go out longingly to the brave fellows fighting for truth and liberty "over there."

Please note, in the first place, that cakes in which sugar is the only "sweetener" dry into sawdusty unpalatableness far sooner than those which contain molasses. The latter and honey keep the cakes soft and creamy.

Old Virginia "Ginger Cakes"

("Cookies" as a title came into fashion at a later date.)

Rub together a half-cup of butter and the same of lard until they are thoroughly incorporated. Work into this a small cup of sugar and a larger cup of molasses. Stir into these half a cupful of cold water. Beat to a creamy mixture and add a teaspoonful of ground ginger and the same of ground cinnamon, with just a dash of cloves. Next comes a rounded teaspoonful of baking soda, dissolved in hot water. Beat hard for one minute and work in enough flour for a rather stiff dough. Roll out into a thin sheet, cut into shapes and bake quickly.

When they are cold, but still fresh, wrap in waxed or thick tissue-paper and pack in tin cracker-boxes saved for this purpose. If you have not these, use thick paper boxes, but pack these in wooden boxes for shipment over seas.

Sugar Cookies

Rub one cupful of butter and two of sugar to a smooth cream. Add to this the beaten yolks of two eggs, then an even teaspoonful of nutmeg and the same of cinnamon. Next, one cupful of flour with which a half-teaspoonful of baking-powder has been sifted three times, and the stiffly beaten white of one egg. Finally, beat in another cupful of sifted flour and the stiffened white of another egg.

Roll into a sheet a quarter of an inch thick, cut into rounds and stick a raisin in the center of each. Bake in a brisk oven.

Dried Currant Cookies

Cream four tablespoonfuls of butter with two scant cupfuls of sugar (brown sugar will keep the cookies soft longer than white), add the yolks of two eggs beaten very light, then two even cupfuls of flour in which a level teaspoonful of baking-powder has been sifted twice; next, a teaspoonful of mingled cinnamon and nutmeg; lastly, a cupful of dried currants previously washed very clean and dried in the sun, then chopped fine. Roll out with quick, light strokes and cut into shapes. Bake in a steady oven. The fruit tends to keep the cakes soft.

War Cookies

Sift together two cupfuls of flour and one and a half cupfuls of oatmeal. When they are well-blended, sift all twice with a teaspoonful of baking-soda. Stir into this four tablespoonfuls of melted butter (or a substitute) and a saltspoonful of salt. Now, moisten with a cup of cold water mixed with one of molasses, and half a cupful of powdered sugar. The dough should be just stiff enough to roll out easily. Cut into rounds or squares and bake. Lay oiled tissue-paper between the rows of cakes and over the top. These cookies are toothsome, wholesome, and warranted to keep until they are eaten up.

EVEN while writing the foregoing I received a letter from a mother who has two sons in France—in the trenches—and another who anxiously awaits his majority—that he may answer the next call. It is safe to say that there is not a home in our country that numbers young men among its inmates, which might not wave the starred service flag from door or window. We women of America in this year of our Lord 1918 are emphatically a Sisterhood of Sacrifice (and the heart aches to the core in reflecting how often of Suffering). We are laborers together in a sacred cause. Account nothing as trivial that can contribute to the comfort and efficiency of our boys at the front.

You remarked truly, some months ago, that the rudiments of housekeeping are the same from one generation to another. You said as truly that, in the main, the housewife of today will be the better for the study we must put forth in the school of patience under changed conditions. I am much older now than when I served my novitiate in housewifery—and in patience! But I seem to enjoy planning meals and studying other domestic economies more now than then. For my boy—the light of my life—is at the front, and I am continually thinking that by conserving food I am helping him to win. I have another boy, a farmer and a much-needed help to his parents, whose health is poor. On this account he has not been called as yet. Still, he longs to go, and we know not when his time may come. His brother enlisted at the first call and has been abroad since last December. His last letters tell me that he is now where the fight rages most fiercely. I, his mother, can only pray and trust and work harder to win. That's why I have sent you a few recipes, telling how to use left-overs. That is my part of the Great War—to save at home that the government may be the better fitted to carry on its operations abroad.

May God help the Corner to be a power for good as we journey along the pathway of Life! Mrs. I. F. M. (Montana).

I AM sure that every reader of that letter will feel a thrill of pride in the true patriot and devout Christian who does her housework the more conscientiously and zealously because she considers every ingenious device for saving foods and making the best of every crumb and crust a direct offering to her country and the cause of liberty and justice to which she has given her son. One inspired sentence rings in my mind when I read and hear and see what women are doing for the Land of the Free in this our day:

"Greater love hath no man than this—that a man lay down his life for his friend."

What of the mother-love that lays a son with prideful willingness upon the altar of country? Yet—to the everlasting honor and glory of our sex be it remembered—this is what hundreds of thousands of our American women are doing.

Suffer, in this connection, a reply I have just made to a man who asks wonderingly "why three-fourths of the letters mailed by men in the field to friends at home are addressed to mothers, and but one-quarter to wives and sweethearts and sisters."

The answer is plain to the mind of one who has kept pace with the accounts of enlistments all over the country. The vast majority of our recruits are young, unmarried men, unhampered by family ties.

Do you ask why this note and reply are admitted to the Corner? As a testimony—as honorable to human nature as it is significant to the might and endurance of maternal influence—to the hold the mother has and holds forever upon the respect and love of the "man whom the Lord hath given her." Is not this worth living and toiling and—dying for?

pal; she had figuratively been under fire and had come out victorious.

"Miss Ellis," Captain Purcell told her when he stopped her on Main Street, "you ought to be across there with the boys. You're a winner, you are," and then he became confused and apologized for the way in which he spoke.

"Captain Purcell," Mary said after a brief second of retrospection, "you and your men are going away from here pretty soon, and when you go life will be pretty empty. You see—" she stopped.

"Miss Ellis," the Captain spoke quickly, "I—I think I have heard of your trouble here in town."

MARY looked up quickly into his great brown eyes.

"Trouble?" she laughed, ever so slightly. "Why, I don't suppose it ought to be called trouble. It's just that I don't belong. I live on Orchard Street and I ought to live on Fulton—that's all."

"No, that isn't all. You see, here in Westport, just like lots of the places, it's a case of 'no prophet is without honor save in his own country.'"

Mary laughed. "It's true, Miss Ellis. The trouble in this place is that they can't realize that they ought to be taking you for what you are worth—not what you used to be, or what your father was, or your grandfather—"

"You're very kind to say that." "I mean it, and I want to tell you right now that any time I can do anything for you, I wish you'd let me know. I don't want to sound like a snob, Miss Ellis, but my father has a pile of money, and mother's got influence in plenty of circles. She's chairman of most of the boards of relief work in France. Say why don't you join some sort of an organization and go across? Couldn't you get away?"

"Yes," she said eagerly. "But there are reasons why I am afraid no one would want me."

"Reasons! You mean that this bunch of tame cats would try to queer you?" He looked aghast. "Yes—I suppose they would." Then, after a pause: "Say, Miss Ellis, won't you walk down to the drug store with me? I'm panting for an ice cream soda; and then maybe I'll be able to think."

Mary accepted graciously, and sure enough the ice cream soda served as an inspiration, for when they had finished, Captain Purcell turned suddenly.

"I've got it!" he sounded as though he had the key to the Kiel Canal. "I'll write to mother. She likes you a lot, and I took the liberty of telling her what I had heard in Westport. She thinks you're a mighty game girl to go on with the fight. I'll bet that mother can find a way for you to go to France."

Mary Ellis thanked him graciously, but never for an instant did she dare to hope. A couple of days passed, a week, and the boys of the two companies slipped out early one morning with no one, not even Mary Ellis, to wave good-by. They were acting under sealed orders.

At the beginning of the week, while Mary Ellis tried her best to reconstruct her suddenly empty life, a big automobile came along the dirt road called Orchard Street, and, much to the unshown disgust of the liveried driver, stopped before the Ellis house. A woman of sixty got out and went up the path. It was Mrs. Robert Purcell!

The automobile stopped before the house for over an hour, and then Mrs. Purcell came out of the Ellis house, and Mary Ellis walked with her.

"Then we shall call this all settled?" Mrs. Purcell said as she offered her hand in parting. "You will be ready by the nineteenth. It's only ten days, you know."

"I will be ready." Mary's voice was pitched unaccustomedly high, and a tremor shook her words.

"Good—and I will expect you for luncheon on Friday."

The two women shook hands and Mrs. Purcell stepped into the automobile. As the machine started down the street, she turned and waved to Mary Ellis. The girl was still standing there, motionless as one in a trance.

WHEN Mr. Luther Terry returned to the newspaper store, he was visibly excited. He ran up the steps of the porch with unaccustomed vigor, and he forgot to close the front door behind him as he hurried into the hall. He stopped abruptly as he saw his wife and son. The young man—a government engineer serving in civilian capacity—was dressed for the street, the bag at his feet indicating a journey.

"What do you suppose?" Terry senior exclaimed breathlessly. "Mary Ellis is going to France."

Mrs. Terry turned quickly, a gasp of surprise telling the effect of the news. Frank, however, did not seem amazed. "Yep. I just heard it down the street. She's leaving day after tomorrow."

"To France!" Mrs. Terry found her tongue. "What's she going to do?"

"Work in the reconquered villages, as far as I can learn. Richards down at the drug store told me. She's been buying supplies."

"Yes," Frank Terry interrupted. "She told me the other evening. Several groups of American women are over there, and others are going. Mary speaks French; she's got the best disposition in the world; and if she can't help the people of northern France reconstruct their lives and their work, no one can."

"She told you the other night?" Mrs. Terry asked, incredulously.

"Yes, and as you raised so much fuss about my talking with her, I thought you would only be bored by any news that concerned her."

Mrs. Terry was silent for a long minute. Frank drew on one glove.

"Well," she said with great emphasis, "I'll guarantee she comes back in disgrace."

"Oh, you do!" her son answered quickly. "Well, I'll guarantee that when she gets over there the people will realize Mary Ellis's true worth."

"Yes," Terry senior added his bit, "and I'll do my guaranteeing that the day will come when we'll all be mighty glad to think that we knew Mary Ellis!"

None of them realized it then, but all three speeches were uncannily prophetic. The situation was set for big, swift-shifting events at the front in France, in which Mary Ellis is to show her high quality of spirit and courage.

President Wilson to the Churches

THE following letter has been received from President Wilson in response to resolutions of loyalty adopted by churches in all parts of the country, expressing confidence in his leadership and assuring him of their devotion to the cause for which our nation is fighting:

"The White House, Washington, 3 August, 1918.

"MY DEAR DR. SPEER: I thank you sincerely for sending me the very interesting and inspiring messages from the several churches which you have been kind enough to have made accessible to me in a binding. If I followed my own impulse, I would certainly reply to some of these messages, but I see only too clearly that if I began I should begin to discriminate as between one message and another or else be obliged to answer them all, which would be out of the question. I must content myself with asking you to avail yourself of any opportunity you may have to say with what interest and inspiration I have received them.

"Cordially and sincerely yours,
WOODROW WILSON.

"DR. ROBERT E. SPEER, Chairman General War-Time Commission of the Churches, New York."

Young People's Topics for September 22

Lessons from Bible Characters

Christian Endeavor Topic. Heb. 11:32-40;
12:1, 2

PAUL himself in the reference for this topic indicates the best lesson to be gained from the lives of Bible characters, which is that we, confronted by the weight of their testimony, should lack nothing in faith, but should press forward in the power of Christ toward the certain reward of faithful discipleship. Not one of these whose faith or sufferings Paul so vividly describes, had one-half as certain a foundation for their faith as we ourselves; yet none faltered and each received power from God to win victory in his name. So we, if we will fight his battles with no thought of our own comfort or desires, ambitions or future or prospects, will find ourselves blessed beyond all that we can ask for.

Listening to God's Word

Epworth League Topic. Psa. 78:1-8

THIS topic is intended to introduce the League Study Courses for the winter. Notwithstanding the fact that many of the young men are in France or in camp, many of the girls in the Red Cross work at home or abroad, and the best doing all they can to aid the nation in its battle for right, it is worth while to gather together as many as possible for one of the regular study courses planned for the winter. We will get strength for the battle ahead, fortitude to meet tomorrow as it may come to us, greater power for good both in these present days and in the days to follow. For the regular study of God's Word, as it is presented in one of these courses, full details may be secured by addressing the general office of the League at 740 N. Rush St., Chicago, Ill., or Ralph A. Diffendorfer, 150-5th Ave., N. Y. City, N. Y.

Baptist Young People's Day

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Eph. 6:20

ALL who name the name of Christ are like Paul, ambassadors in bonds; but unlike Paul, our bonds are only those of love which bind us to Him through whom we have found eternal life. The Young People's Movement has been from the beginning strongly marked by personal evangelism, impressing upon each his duty as an ambassador of Christ, which has developed many who have become His special messengers. Full particulars regarding the denominational aspects of the day and plans for its observance may be secured by addressing the American Baptist Publication Society, 1702 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Saved by Children's Gardens

THE United States School Gardens are now far enough along to enable an estimate to be made of the children's contribution to the Nation's food supply.

One million five hundred thousand boys and girls are enrolled in the Garden Army.

Crop reports indicate that the average patch cultivated by the youngsters is a little over one-fifteenth of an acre. The products, which range from arsnips to pigs and from turnips to turkeys, average approximately $500 an acre.

In other words, the school children of America will have this year contributed not less than $50,000,000 worth of food products to the economy of the war.

Because this food is consumed at home, or marketed in the immediate vicinity of where it is grown, it is calculated that the children have given railway Director McAdoo the equivalent of 50,000 freight cars for the transportation of coal and other war necessities.

How to heat a church

Common sense demands a radical change in your present system

FUEL-WASTE seems today almost unthinkable, but it is to be feared that many churches waste fuel without thinking.

Isn't it true that, just for the sake of using two or three rooms, at intervals through the week, the furnace is kept going seven days a week?

On Sundays, the one busy day, of course you require plenty of heat throughout the building, but on most of the other days you could dispense with your costly heating system entirely—if you only had some way of heating, for a few hours at a time, the few rooms that are actually needed.

But with one big heating-plant you cannot avoid this waste. It is the system itself that is at fault. The only way to economize is to change the system.

The churches should set the example

Grinnell Ready-Heat does everything that your costly, fuel-wasting heating-plant does. It heats the whole church edifice perfectly—BUT, it does more.

If only one, two, or three rooms are needed, it heats these rooms at only a trifling percentage of the cost of heating the entire building continuously.

Grinnell Ready-Heat is a combined system of GAS-heating and ventilation. It is operated through radiators just like steam or hot water. It is turned on or off as easily as a gas-jet, so needs no skilled attendance. It will heat any number of rooms, as long as required, without a particle of heat being wasted on unoccupied parts of the building.

Fuel-economy is a vital national issue

Grinnell Ready-Heat, with its thermostatic control feature, costs less to install than a steam system with a similar controlling device. It probably will not cost as much to run as other systems, because you pay only for the fuel that you use and you do not have to use fuel except when you need heat. In fact, there is usually a very considerable saving in using Grinnell Ready-Heat in any intermittently heated building. Consider the coming winter. Think of the coal troubles of the past winter. Think of the thousands of families needing coal who cannot obtain it.

Then consult your gas company or write us for some interesting information on this vital subject of fuel-saving. Address General Fire Extinguisher Company, W. Exchange Street, Providence, R. I.

In a church like this—
Heat now used on Sunday is enough to keep all rooms warm through the week when needed.

An Honor Medal

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

I WROTE a little article, a few weeks ago, about a brave woman who had given four sons to the service of her country. And since I wrote that little article many others have come to me—letters from other women who have also given their loved ones to their nation in her hour of need. I will quote one of them—a letter from Missouri:

"Recently I have been quite sick and am scarcely able to write," begins the letter; "but today, when I read what you had written about the smiling little woman sitting in the motor car behind a service flag bearing four stars, I could not refrain from writing to you, even though I knew that my letter would be serawly."

"I read of her eldest son and her son-in-law enlisting—read with tears in my eyes, although I supposed it to be a touching little made-up story; I read of her youngest going, and wept; and then, through the blinding tears, I read of the other, a deaf-mute, applying and being accepted as a bomb-thrower. And I laid down my paper and cried out my very heart! And I prayed, 'O God—O God, must these things be?'"

"And then all at once a new thought came to me—I thought, 'Must I, who have but two grandsons in the service, be less brave than she who has four sons?' So I dried my tears and read on to the end. And I was very much surprised to hear that the story was a true story, and that the little woman in the motor car was a real woman. God bless her, and may all other women, whose hearts are aching—and breaking—these days learn to be as brave as she is!"

That was the letter from a little lady in Missouri—a little lady who was sick—too sick, almost, to write to me. And as I read the letter—a letter penned in a hand that the writer herself called serawly—the words danced in a mist before my eyes.

Oh, that little woman from Missouri has touched the keynote of the situation that American women are facing! She is looking up through her tears to ask, "Shall I be less brave than my neighbor is?" And she is answering her own question by brushing the tears aside and saying, "God bless my neighbor—and strengthen all other women until they are as brave as she!"

WE read, very nearly every day, of soldiers who have received medals for bravery on the field of battle. We read of soldiers who are given war crosses because of the sacrifices that they have made in the cause of freedom. But, until yesterday, I never heard of a medal created for the brave women who, through the personal sacrifice of their loved ones, are making the winning of this war possible.

Just yesterday I heard it—the story of the "Woman's National Honor Medal." Just yesterday I saw it, lying in its velvet-lined box, and I think that it is a fitting symbol of the courage and the bravery that it stands for.

The Woman's National Honor Medal has been created so that the woman who has given a son, a husband, or a brother to the service of her country may show to the world her pride in him. It has been created so that she may find some ray of comfort in the wearing of a beautiful bit of jewelry that has been designed for the express purpose of comforting her. It has been created to keep alive that spark of romance and sentiment that war kills as surely as it kills bodies. And it has been created that woman who are every day proving their bravery may own some solid recognition of it.

The "National Woman's Honor Medal" can only be obtained after an engraved certificate, proving the owner's right to wear it, has been made out and signed. It is an emblem that will never be made roughly, in enormous quantities—that will never grow too common. One seeing a woman with a medal pinned to her frock will know surely, and at once, that she is the mother, the wife, or the sister of a soldier.

The medal has been designed with an eye to the beauty of absolute simplicity. It is the work of one who has tried to show the dignity and courage and utter lack of self-pity that lies in the heart of every American woman. It seems a very nearly impossible task to put such a spirit into a bit of silver or gold, and yet the designer of the medal has succeeded in that task! For when I saw the medal lying in its box my first thought was—"Isn't it right!"

It is right—just right! For on the face of the medal there is one large star denoting the one great sacrifice—American women, while, surrounding the star and completing the Red, White, and Blue effect, is the inscription "In Recognition of the Sacrifices of American Womanhood." On the reverse side engraved the picture of a boy bidding his mother, wife, and sister good-by—a picture encircled by the famous words of President Wilson—"The world must be made safe for democracy."

I WAS talking with a soldier, not long ago. He was a serious young soldier and he spoke very beautifully of his mother. "You know," he told me, "we fellows all realize that the women have a hard time than we have! We all realize that even though we have the actual danger to meet, they have something much harder to bear—the waiting at home!" "Even when we are going into battle we have the excitement and the adventure to keep us up. They have none of it. Their part is praying, and reading casualty lists, and always half-fearing when there is a knock at the door or telegraph boy going down the street."

"We are the ones who must do the fighting. But we aren't nearly as brave as they are!"

GROWN-UPS may not believe the tale, but the children, bless them, are wiser. For their merry little hearts find much in music that we miss. Haven't they heard the good fairies sing and laugh from behind the shadowy tone-leaves of the Columbia Grafonola? Isn't that where Buster Bear, Peter Rabbit, Old Mr. Toad, and Reddy Fox frolic and talk when Mother puts in the Bed-Time Records? Lucky the children who grow up in homes made musical by Columbia Records and the Columbia Grafonola.

COLUMBIA RECORDS give children their own fairy tales, their own songs and dances, and the quaint animal recitations they adore. And such a companionable, entertaining friend of little folks is the Grafonola. No wonder they love him so, for he can keep a room full of children happy and amused the whole day long. Never tired or cross. Always ready for songs and games and dances. A mother's best friend on a rainy day!

Weed Tire Chains Prevent Accidents Like This

The Black Car skidded. In a flash pleasure was changed to peril. The driver had neglected to put on Tire Chains—he “took a chance.”

Down the wet, slippery road he came, but at the turn the rear tires skidded—the car spun around, crashed through the fence and brought the occupants face to face with death.

The White Car came down the same road and with only a slight slackening of speed rounded the sharp turn in perfect safety.

The rear wheels followed the front wheels exactly—they tracked true as flanged car wheels upon steel rails—all four tires were equipped with

LOSING in eight weeks what they had gained in four months of furious attack, the German armies on September 9 were fighting desperately in the old British and French lines fronting the famous Hindenburg line, to which it was probable that the main bodies had already retreated. General Haig's men were within six miles of St. Quentin, their line to the northward crossing the old Hindenburg line at Havrincourt Wood. General Humbert's men, advancing against bitter resistance were within two miles of La Fère. General Mangin's men were astride the Hindenburg line south of La Fère at Barisis and were threatening Anizy le Château, one of the outposts of St. Gobain Forest and of Laon. To the northward, on the line facing Cambrai, Douai and Lille, the forward movement appeared to have halted temporarily. In addition to their loss of conquered territory, conservative estimates place the German losses in the four months at more than 1,200,000, of whom 500,000 were killed or prisoners. The Allied loss is not only less, but there are now in France 600,000 fully equipped American troops.

THE German armies, on September 3, while in general retreat, were nevertheless putting up a most vigorous resistance along the main battle front. From just north of Noyon their line lay on the eastern bank of the partly completed Canal du Nord as far as Ham and from Ham northward they were defending the line of the Somme River, which through most of its distance was paralleled by the Somme Canal, the waterways being separated by marshy grounds, making the crossings hardly feasible except at the established roads, which were under heavy fire. From Péronne almost to Cambrai and northward to the neighborhood of Douai, the line ran along the unfinished Canal du Nord, which, though dry, presented a considerable barrier, the ditch being eighty feet wide at the top and sixty feet at the bottom, with walls smoothly faced with granite. This canal was back of the Droocourt-Quéant switch line or Wotan line, which fell before British assaults on September 2 and 3. Along this line the Germans were heavily in force with artillery well placed, and British and French patrols which emerged from cover on the western side of the line were met instantly with withering machine-gun and rifle fire. Northward of this line, in the old Lys salient, the German troops were withdrawing rapidly and being followed closely by the British armies, alongside which one American division, the 30th National Guard, was fighting.

South of this line, between Noyon and a point east of Fismes on the Vesle, the Germans were again in retreat, their withdrawal here having been forced by the threat of General Mangin's constantly deepening wedge along the Oise and Ailette, north and west of Soissons. With General Mangin's tenth army there was fighting the American 32nd National Guard division of Michigan and Wisconsin troops. It was these troops who took Juvigny and Terny Sorny and who defeated and took prisoners from four of Germany's proudest divisions in the first days of September, prisoners who marched to the rear with tears of humiliation in their eyes instead of smiles of satisfaction.

Speaking of the American troops to a correspondent, on September 4, General Mangin said: "It is easy to lead Americans to victory, in fact they take their generals with them as upon an onrushing tide." The correspondent added that General Mangin had had such experience with Americans that "when the high command placed in his hands the lance for the thrust against the Germans north of the Aisne he promptly put a sharp American tip on it."

IN order to delay the British and relieve pressure on their badly battered ranks the Germans dammed the Scarpe and the Senece and flooded the lowlands between the old Wotan line and Douai. The British progress continued in spite of difficulties. The British troops, on September 3, rescued from the village of Eecourt St. Quentin, 46 civilians, most of them women, who had been hiding in cellars for over a week. They were a remnant of 200 civilians who had been living in the village. On the previous Saturday they had been told to flee for the British were coming. The 46 preferred to take refuge in the cellars, although the Germans told them that the English artillery would not spare their homes. Gas masks were provided for them. On Tuesday morning one of the men went to the street and was told by German stragglers that the British would soon be in the village. Gladdened by this news the whole 46 came from their shelters and walked across the fields to meet the British patrols. The refugees said that Spanish and Dutch relief committees gave them enough food to keep them from starving, but not enough to enable them to perform the tasks allotted to them by the German officers.

The report, on September 3, that the British had entered Lens was premature; the dispatches have been conflicting and the situation is not yet clear. The British held the western, the Germans the eastern suburbs. The British advance across the line north of Quéant, which was noted last week, was made by three British divisions against ten German divisions which counter-attacked desperately, losing 16,000 men and 100 guns before accepting defeat. But when the British had finally driven forward across their lines the Germans fell back behind the Canal du Nord, and made no further counter-attacks. The French, on September 3, succeeded in making several crossings of the Somme and the Canal du Nord north of Noyon in the face of determined resistance. Twelve hundred prisoners also were taken in the fighting between the Aisne and Ailette. On September 4 the British swung their hammer to the southward and crossed the Canal du Nord on a 15-mile line between Péronne and Cambrai, making good progress to the east of the canal. They were opposed by German machine-gun nests which were wiped out one at a time.

The village of Inchy, about which the tide of battle swirled for days without determination in the fighting of last November, was put well behind the British line and the St. Pierre Vaast Wood, another old battle-ground, was taken definitely from German hands, the British reaching the Péronne-Cambrai road east of these woods and investing Meuvres on the Bapaume-Cambrai road and also on the Hindenburg support line. This town was reported to be an intricate network of trenches and defensive position almost impregnable to direct attack. The British were flanking it on the north and south. Along the line north of the Vesle the German armies, on September 4, had retreated behind the Aisne, leaving only rear guards on the heights south of the river to delay the French and American advance.

War and the American Boy

By
FRED H. RINDGE

"KAISER dead—extra!" yelled the newsboy vociferously, along the company streets in one of our National Army cantonments. Soldiers paused. It was near mess time. Men hastily appeared at barrack windows. In a moment the newsie was sold out. "What's it all about, kid?" I asked. "Oh, nothin' much," was the nonchalant reply. "It was re-ported, somewhere."

Further inquiry led to the not unexpected discovery that "I yell any old thing, now-days. When everybody's talkin' war they'll bite at anything." It was such an easy way to sell his papers, and, whether strictly "moral" or not, was of course all in the game. And this was merely one seemingly insignificant effect of the great war upon childhood. There are other effects far more serious.

Let us look at some of Europe's experiences. In England there are approximately 3,000,000 children twelve to seventeen years of age out of school. Many have gone to work. Thousands of school buildings have inevitably been used for other purposes; half of the teachers have enlisted; educational appropriations have been cut down. Juvenile delinquency has increased at least forty per cent., due to this and other causes. Now England has discovered her mistake and is endeavoring to reorganize her free education, and is appropriating several millions for the purpose. This because "we have no right to handicap these children because of the State's necessities of the moment." The British Health of Munitions Workers Committee says: "When war is destroying so much of its best manhood the nation is under special obligation to secure that the rising generation grow up strong and hardy both in body and character. It is necessary to guard not only against immediate breakdown, but also against the imposition of strains which may stunt future growth and development." The importance of taking such a stand is greatly emphasized by an investigation of seventeen towns made by England's Home Office. This study revealed a fifty per cent. increase in larceny, and a thirty per cent. increase in assaults and gambling by children. The condition seems to be almost universal in England, France and Italy, and almost as bad in Canada.

JUVENILE crime doubled in Berlin from 1914 to 1915. In Munich there were as many youthful delinquents during the first three months of 1915 as in the whole of 1914. Frankfurt had a forty per cent. increase in serious juvenile crime. Dr. Albert Helling, a German police judge, says: "The excessive excitement of the childish imagination by events of war, especially as depicted in trashy literature, is one of the brutalizing influences acting on our young life. To inoculate the children with hate would breed lust for revenge and could only bear evil fruit." Would that all Germany agreed with him!

As for America, reports are coming from many sources indicating an increase in juvenile delinquency. For example, Chicago has had a thirty-six per cent. increase between June, 1916, and June, 1917. Probation officers in New York City, because of "the unsettlement of life and thought caused by war," report a considerable increase in cases brought before the children's court. To be sure, we are hardly in the war deep enough yet to judge of ultimate effects, but these signs on the horizon should cause uneasiness. America is in a position to profit immensely by Europe's experiences in this whole matter.

I think it would be fair to give as causes of the increase in Europe's boyhood crime the absence of parental authority (the father often being at war and the mother in the factory); decrease of schooling; evil shop influences; long hours and hard conditions of child labor; increase of wages without instruction in the proper use of money; employment in agriculture without wise supervision; decrease in activities of constructive social agencies and in right opportunity for helpful leisure; decrease of police protection; increase of all kinds of temptation; high costs; the bad example of soldiers on leave; increase of exciting motion pictures, "literature," etc.; and general war stimulation of an abnormal character. Some of these influences were to a small degree making themselves felt in the life of the newsboy who insisted that the Kaiser was dead when he knew better.

Clearly one of the things America must guard most carefully is the maintenance of standards of education and of labor in industry and agriculture. The President, Secretary of War, and many other officials and organizations are urging this. All Europe's experience proves the necessity of careful planning at this point. Let us help the nation's boys to distinguish between jingoism and true patriotism. We do not want another "Children's Crusade." For the sake of the future let us see that children remain in school as long as possible. This is all the more important in as much as the new Child Labor Law has been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. It is to be hoped that this decision may be reversed, or that at least some even better law may be passed at an early date, in spite of the continued obstacles which seem to be in the way.

The British Health of Munitions Workers Committee, after extensive scientific investigations, found it best to recommend that under no circumstances should daily hours be over twelve and that night work should not be performed by girls under eighteen or boys under sixteen. The Chief Factory Inspector says: "A very strong impression has been made on me by the appearance of large numbers of young boys who had been working at munitions for a long time on alternate night and day shifts. They were so spiritless, so dull, so dead in look, so woebegone, and at-it seemed to depend on the kind of boy, the way the farmer handled him, the kind and amount of work required, the method of training and supervision and the opportunity for proper care and recreation. The experiences of last summer prove the advisability of being sure that boys are physically fitted for the work in hand and that they are to live and work under conditions which make for their moral welfare. Every effort must also be made to combat the inevitable tendency of boys not to return to school in the Fall. In New York City, for example, the month of September witnessed about 10,000 fewer pupils in its high schools than in the previous year.

If boys do go into factory work it is far more important now than ever before that they find the right place. There is grave danger that they will merely gravitate toward higher wages, regardless of the future. Christian and social agencies can help prevent this. The school, church, Y. M. C. A. or social settlement can help in vocational education, and in making conditions safe. In sending boys to farm or factory why not prepare them by a preliminary course on certain aspects of farm and factory life, the history of the industry, methods and processes, new inventions, dangers to avoid, special things to look for, possible future in the job, etc.? Training like this would be invaluable.

The conservation of childhood in wartimes lies even deeper than all this. It goes back to the care of the mother in industry and the safeguards of infancy and early school life. Dr. C. L. Wilbur, late vital statistician of the Census Bureau, tells us that 300,000 babies under one year old die each year in the United States, and 15,000 women die annually from causes connected with childbirth. Many of these deaths are preventable. New York City's Health Department declares that 160,000 school children are suffering from pronounced undernourishment, and such conditions will certainly not be improved by war. The cost of living will have a decided relation to the whole problem.

The Department of Labor says that the average family's food bill has grown from $339 in 1913 to $1,426 in 1917. "Despite the average increase of 19 per cent. an hour in wages in the last ten years, and despite a cut in hours of four per cent., the rising cost of foods has operated to reduce the pay of the American workman about 16 per cent., expressed in terms of food his dollar will buy." Not only Mr. Hoover but all of us must do our share in solving this problem.

YESTERDAY as I was thinking of the boy problem in a trolley car near one of our big cantonments a newsboy came in with the usual extra. I was struck by his disheveled appearance. It was very cold, and the lad was shivering in a flannel shirt, a light coat and trousers, and shoes much the worse for wear. In marked contrast, I could not help noticing a pair of new canvas leggings, which he occasionally glanced at with evident pride. The youngster had spent all his spare pennies for those leggings. Why? Just to be "like the soldiers"! And the boys are watching the soldiers with all their hero-worship and their capacity for imitation! Woe be unto us if we do not direct the devotion, loyalty and irrepressible energy of our boyhood into constructive rather than destructive channels!

The task of the future will be quite difficult enough, even if we guard against all these evils in every possible way. If the war should call for even 10,000,000 American soldiers this army will only be one-third as large as the great army of children under fifteen upon whom and their older brothers will fall the burdens of reconstruction. Thinking leaders of all the nations realize that we cannot afford to sacrifice the future for the present. At all costs, child welfare, in all its aspects, must be maintained. Each one of us can do his share!

Just boys, yes, but men in the making tacked with weariness to a dulling of their spirits." England has now realized her mistakes and is endeavoring to correct them. The president of the British Board of Education asked for over $3,800,000 more last year than the year before to spend on education and in keeping children at school. Evidently the many states in our country which have let down the bars of compulsory education have not acted wisely, and they will regret it later. In England the exemptions to school attendance laws permitted for agriculture and "light employment" are now bitterly regretted by the general education authority which sanctioned them. In Budapest children left school to such an extent that there are over 3,000 registered munitions workers under twelve. America will never allow itself to lower its standards to that extent, but we must be forewarned.

CARE must also be taken with boys who go to work on farms. Over 200,000 boys responded patriotically to this call last summer. Some made good while others did more harm than good. In general

Two Nations Honor Lafayette

THE birthday of Lafayette, September 6, was a double anniversary in France and in America, marking also the fourth anniversary of the first battle of the Marne. At a celebration in France General Pershing, exclaiming: "Lafayette! We are here," epigrammatically expressed the meaning of America's military effort, for though the armies he commands are fighting to rid the world of the tyranny of force it is no small satisfaction to the nation that they are repaying to France part of America's debt, for 144 years unliquidated. Throughout the United States, and especially in the cities of the East, the birthday of Lafayette was formally celebrated. In New York City a great mass meeting at the City Hall was addressed by Theodore Roosevelt, another at Union Square, about the Lafayette statue, was addressed by Alton B. Parker, and another in the evening, under the auspices of the French-American Society, was addressed by Secretary of the Interior Lane. Mr. Lane said: "We are speaking in terms of force now, because that is the one language the German Government understands. We will continue to speak in the language from the cannon's mouth until we have achieved the military decision. The military decision will have been reached, as I understand it, when Germany knows that she has been whipped and knows that she will be whipped again if she continues to fight; that she cannot stand against the physical force of the world or its moral force." Everywhere in France and America the anniversary of the Marne was celebrated in the spirit and with the assurance of victory.

A Week in the World's News

AMERICA RECOGNIZES CZECHS. The United States, on September 3 formally recognized the Czecho-Slovaks as a belligerent nation, and the Czecho-Slovak National Council, with headquarters in Washington, as a belligerent government. France, Italy and Great Britain had already recognized the new nation. Major General W. S. Graves and his staff and 1,888 men were reported on September 4 to have reached Vladivostok safely. Ambassador Francis reported early in September that loyal Russians were flocking to the colors of the Czecho-Slovak forces in European Russia. Reports, on September 7, indicated that the Czecho-Slovak armies east of Lake Baikal, attacking from the west and the Cossacks, Czech and Allied forces attacking from the east, had completely defeated the Bolsheviks and had cleared the entire line of the Trans-Siberian railroad from Vladivostok through to European Russia. Nizhny-Novgorod, 265 miles northeast of Moscow, was captured from the Bolsheviks, on September 6, by insurgent peasant troops. There was a persistent rumor, on September 6, that Premier Lenin had succumbed to his wounds and there was a report also that Dora Kaplan, his assassin, had been executed. That part of Russia still under Bolshevik control was reported on September 9 to be experiencing a reign of terror. There had been over 500 executions. The Bolsheviks, supported by German artillery, were reported on September 9 to have recaptured Samara on the Volga from the Czecho-Slovaks.

BREWERIES CLOSE DECEMBER 1. By order of the President, the Fuel and Food Administrations notified the brewing industry of the nation, on September 6, that it must stop brewing on December 1st. The Senate, on September 6, passed the Emergency Agricultural Appropriation Bill carrying its amendment for War Prohibition July 1st. The Presidential order to stop brewing made necessary a revision of the new revenue bill, as it cut off $400,000,000 in taxes which would have been collected up to July 1. It was suggested that coffee, tea and cocoa, at present untaxed, might have to bear the burden.

BRITISH OUTLAW THE BOLSHEVIKI. On Saturday, August 31, Bolshevik troops, acting under orders of the Bolshevik government in Petrograd, attacked the British Embassy and Captain Cromie, who organized the British subjects in the Embassy to resist the intruders, was killed. The Bolshevik troops mutilated his body and refused sulted in the election as President of the Republic of Hsu Shih Chang, former Vice-President of the Privy Council. He was the candidate of the Generals of the Northern Chinese Army.

BOMB KILLS FOUR IN CHICAGO. A bomb was exploded, on September 4, in the Adams Street entrance of the Chicago Post-Office building. An 18-inch wall was demolished and the entrance to the building severely damaged. A large hole was blown in the floor and four persons, a post-office clerk, a sailor, a carrier and a young man, were killed and many injured.

without being stopped and asked for your credentials. Of 20,000 men taken in custody on the first day, 250 were sent to the camps, 278 were sent to the city prison for further consideration of their cases and 250 sent to the local draft boards for rigid examination. The round-up of slackers in the New York metropolitan district reached 60,187 men who had been temporarily arrested, while about 1500 of them proved to be wilful and intentional slackers. The slacker raids were condemned in the Senate on September 5. Senators Calder, Chamberlain and Johnson denounced them as illegal, while Senator Poindexter defended them as a legitimate effort to single out slackers. President Wilson called on Attorney-General Gregory for a full report of all the circumstances connected with the round-up.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The Cloudland Mail between New York and Chicago was started on September 5. The New York to Chicago flier was driven 150 miles off his course by a storm and was finally obliged to spend the night in Cleveland. . . . Provost-Marshal General Crowder was planning on September 5 to hold on October 2 the drawing to determine the order of service of the men registered under the new draft law on September 12, and it was expected that the first recruits from the new registration would be called to the service by October 15. . . . The Peruvian and American Governments concluded on September 5 an arrangement for the use in inter-allied trade of ten German vessels seized by Peru last June. . . . The Senate, on September 5, adopted a joint resolution authorizing the President to establish a dry zone to such extent as he may deem necessary around coal mines, ammunition factories, ship-building plants or such other plants for war material as may seem to him to require such action. The House concurred September 9. . . . President Wilson in a proclamation issued on September 2 announced that the present price of $2.20 per bushel for wheat would be applied to the 1919 crop unless an investigation next spring determined that the farmers needed an increase. . . . The Council of National Defense on September 2 emphasized a previous request to patriots to confine their Christmas purchases to useful articles and to carry their own packages wherever possible. The War Department also announced that there would be no Christmas packages sent abroad this year. . . . The saving of gasoline on Sunday, September 1, by non-use of pleasure cars and motor boats, was estimated to have reached 100,000 to 150,000 barrels. . . . The Alien Property Custodian took over on Sept. 4 all the ships of the American Trans-Atlantic Company, known as the Wagner ships, over which America and Great Britain had considerable diplomatic correspondence while America was still neutral. Great Britain claimed that the vessels were German owned, though operated under the American flag. Wagner, however, swore that they were American owned and the American Government succeeded in getting some of them released from English custody. Evidence now in possession of the authorities shows that the ships were purchased with German money and that Wagner was another of Von Bernstorff's disguises; also that the former ambassador hoped to involve Great Britain and the United States through the activities of these vessels. . . . Director General of Railroads McAdoo estimates that the roads are saving $23,000,000 a year by the elimination of competition. . . . The Jewish New Year, falling on September 7, brought out the fact that there are in America 3,300,000 Jews.

The scene of the bomb outrage in the Chicago Post-Office to permit an English clergyman to give it the last rites of the church. The British Government in England, on September 4, after having verified the reports of the outrage, arrested the Bolshevik representatives in England and notified members of the Soviet Government that if they failed to give complete satisfaction or committed further acts of violence against a British subject the members of the Soviet Government would be held responsible and the British Government would make every endeavor "to secure that they be treated as outlaws by the governments of all civilized nations and that no place of refuge would be left to them." The French Embassy was also menaced.

REPUBLICANS WIN MAINE ELECTION. Statewide elections in Maine on September 9 resulted in the reelection of Governor Milliken and Senator Fernald, both Republicans, and the election of four Republican congressmen. The Democrats had hoped to carry the 2nd district.

NEW PRESIDENT IN CHINA. The Chinese elections, on September 6, re-

Just before the explosion a man was seen to run from the entrance and slightly before that two suspicious characters were noticed loitering in that vicinity. More than 1500 detectives soon began to scour the city for suspects. Big Bill Haywood, the convicted I. W. W. chief, was dictating to a stenographer on one of the upper floors of the building at the time the bomb was laid. The outrage was variously blamed upon the I. W. W., German plotters and Chicago anarchists.

HUNTING A NEEDLE IN A HAYSTACK. On September 3 several thousand soldiers, sailors, policemen and special marshals started out to round up slackers in various parts of New York City and adjoining territory in New Jersey. Every man who appeared to be between the ages of 20 and 32 was stopped and forced to show his National Army registration and classification cards. If these were missing, the man was taken in custody. It was impossible on either the third or fourth of September to leave New York City by ferry, train, taxi or any other conveyance

BOYS will be boys, but they will be better boys if you give them a chance, and nothing beats a camp fire. Next week we will go to the woods with the Scouts and hear the fire crackle while we tell good stories and the wind whispers secrets to the pines.

A true heart penetrates disguise. Mary Ellis solved the mystery of the man in the night, and there was one spy less in France. In eight days you will know how she did it.

Sometimes we hear people bemoaning the lot of this poor old world. Dr. S. F. Goodheart, in next week's Sermon, tells us how the world has been enriched through Christ.

Major Waters's visit to Jerusalem has made clearer to all of us the great need of relief and the heroic work made possible by Christian giving. Another letter will bring us the personal story of one who saw the suffering, shared it, and helped bring relief.

"A Little Bit of Everything"

By W. Livingston Larned

THE big touring car had swung away from the main road and was running along a narrower tree-shaded turnpike, garnished with autumnal colors. Very soon, after numerous twists and undulating turns, the roadway suddenly drew up at a one-story building that squatted comfortably, like some big animate thing, under several elms.

A lazy hound dog lay sprawled at full length in a puddle of dust. A Ford, sagging under its load of tar paper, egg nails and sash weights, drew up and came to a wheezy halt. Several farmers, with heads that touched, were reading the latest city paper on a bench that stretched between two pine posts at front.

The nervous gentleman of fifty-six, the linen duster, could scarcely wait for his machine to stop. "This is the place," he called to his chauffeur. "Wait for me!" And with that he most ran into the building.

There he stood, at its portal, sniffing the heavy fumes of kerosene, molasses, brown sugar and cheese, and fairly feasting his spectacled eyes on the homely vision of unuttered shelves.

"Hasn't changed a bit!" was his final observation. "Bless the old general store!"

In another ten minutes he was seated on a gar-barrel, feet dangling, and Mr. Hendrickson was trying to ask questions and answer them, all in the same breath.

"I USED to live on the hill over yonder," explained the man in the linen duster. "As a boy I've roamed every mile of these happy valleys. I was born nine miles to the east. We moved to this section after the big farm. Your father built and operated this very store. As far as I can see, identically the same. I was afraid—very much afraid, that time had dignified it or given it veneer. And then the inspiration came to come here. Before the snows closed in—I wanted to be a boy for an hour or so. Cut me off a hunk of that cheese. And I'll have a handful of crackers. And if you keep the same kind of sardines that your father kept, I'll take a tin of those too."

The man in the linen duster has grown to be the proprietor of a chain of great department stores. He confesses that the basic business soul of his enterprise was really born in this small general store of his boyhood. It is the memory of things as they were that humanized his wonderful stores and gave them their prestige. For he insists that a large institution may possess intimate personal character. It may have a working organism, closely akin to humans themselves. Some people are lovable, others are unlovable. It's the same way with stores. You sense the moment you enter the door. It's there or it is not there. Nor can this change, indefinable something be deceptively manufactured. You can't are it in a technical con trap.

"Some communities," explains the man in the linen duster, "create a store like this one. It grows to have a pulse —you can touch it and feel the thrill of the entire community. I can remember how I used to drive over here with my mother, once a week; how her face lighted as we rounded the road; how the kerosene can was filled and the jugs restocked with molasses, and the fat, plump bags of feed pushed under the seat; how the twenty or thirty little purchases were neatly tucked in an empty crate, and how the kindly man that was your father, Mr. Hendrickson, took them painstakingly out again, one by one, as he listed them on a piece of wrapping paper.

"I can see my mother, butterfly fashion, hovering over that rear counter, where were the dress goods. A fresh case of ginghams and flowered calicos had just been opened. They were crisp and bright and smelling sweet of the mills. And my mother selected some with pink rosebuds on it, and held the package in her lap all the way back home.

"My mother selected some with pink rosebuds"

"I recall distinctly that same twine-holder, dangling from a cord. I see your father reaching up and holding one end of the twine in his mouth, as he fumbled with an obstreperous package. I see the tinware section, glistening in the sun that came through a side window. The big dishpans always fascinated me, for I could see my face in them as I passed.

"Just as human nature changes but little, so do the essential characteristics of salesmanship remain inflexible. The same old thrill comes to me as I look around now. That new cream separator in the corner, and the ebony range, and the pie-and-span baskets suspended from the ceiling. Canned goods, compactly arranged on their shelves, each radiant colored label a spark in the shadows; were a constant inspiration to me as a boy. And that reminds me: your father ordered canned goods by the looks of the label. It was a failing of his. The largest, reddest tomato, the most luscious peach or pear, the most generous cluster of beans. His shelves took on the appearance of orchards and truck gardens; they made you hungry to look at 'em.

"I know, too, that your father was successful with his general store because it was the cleanest one in the county. He even put heavy manila paper under the side meat on the floor, and that is the very apex of country store idealism. I seem to remember him as being the man with a broom. When he wasn't selling he was sweeping."

"MIGHTY hard to keep a general store tidy," observed Mr. Hendrickson. "It's the nature of the place, and the goods. So much truck, so many fussy little odds and ends. And we have to do so much running back and forth. We get a case of goods in every day or so."

"But a general store can be as clean as any other store," said the man in the linen duster. "You prove it. You are your father all over again. How is business? What has war done in this community?"

"Don't notice much difference," was the answer. "People must have the stock we keep. Our store is a necessity. I guess you might consider it an 'essential industry.' The farmers are a lot more prosperous than they were three years ago. They are making more and spending more. That has brought prosperity to our place here. We must continually improve our stock, keep it up to the minute, add new lines. Folks that never owned little luxuries before are buying them, and that doesn't mean that they are neglecting to support the war, either. They can do both; and they do."

"Do they buy because their fathers and grandfathers bought such and so?" asked the man in the linen duster curiously. "Do they buy an article simply because it has grown to be a habit with the family for generations?"

"Can't say that they do," said Mr. Hendrickson. "The trade-marked lines are more in demand than ever. The magazines have been responsible for that. I know, because people bring in an advertisement, point out a certain article, and ask for it. That makes it necessary for us to depart from our old methods of ordering goods. The salesman that comes in and tries to stock us up, because he has been doing it for thirty years, is not as likely to succeed as he used to."

"Trade-marks sell goods, then?"

"Yes, sir, they certainly do. I am thinking now, as you speak, of a certain laundry soap we used to keep. It has been a splendid seller for as long as I can remember. Here of late the sales have fallen off to nearly nothing, and two new products that come in flakes are being asked for. They are both heavily advertised."

"Then, again, there's another thing I've discovered. A line that I have ordered automatically, year after year—because it was dependable and popular—has grown shoddy. The labels were the same, and it looked the same, but the stuff wasn't being put into it. That's one danger of buying because you've always bought in the past. It isn't fair to your trade. But I have found a plan to fix that up. I manage to carefully analyze old lines every so often and make sure that they are up to standard."

"My father kept a package coffee as long as he was in business. We sold it to the exclusion of almost every other brand. And because he had found it worthy, I kept right on when I took charge. I kept hearing complaints, and one day I opened up a half-dozen packages and looked the contents over. It was a substitute trash—very poor. The physical appearance was identical, but the coffee had gone down."

"From your observation," went on the man in the linen duster, opening the tin of sardines and placing three lengthwise on a cracker, "do you think the average general store has made any material advances? Is it just where it was, when—well, when I was a boy and you were a boy—or have they gone ahead, keeping pace with the times?"

Mr. Hendrickson reflected. "It's unfair to ask a general store to make radical changes," said he at last. "We are a sort of supply depot for folks. We can't engage in stunts. I do think, however, that I can see improvements. Advertising, for one thing, has virtually compelled us to keep up to date in many lines of goods. If a new carpet-sweeper is put on the market, we put it in. We must. People call for it. If a manufacturer of working-clothes, overalls, etc., starts advertising extensively in this community, we must stock up without delay. Otherwise the trade will drive over to another store. The automobile makes the purchaser independent, you know."

"The general store has little or no competition in many cases," suggested the man in the linen duster. "Take your place, for example. No other establishment like it for ten miles or more in either direction. Before the day of the automobile, that one factor militated against efficiency and progress. A man did not find it necessary to change his business methods. People had to buy. It was a small monopoly. Things sold themselves almost automatically."

"I guess that's true," nodded Mr. Hendrickson; "but folks are growing steadily more independent. I find that if a man comes in here and can't get exactly what he has set his mind on, he turns around and walks out again. An hour later he is in Marthasville, haying driven across the Miller Turnpike in his automobile. No; it's an age when you must give them what they ask for. Substitution has quit being a profession. Nobody gets away with it in these times—for long."

"I see you are making an addition," said the man in the linen duster. "That can mean only one thing; business is increasing. Yet I do not see that the community has grown to any appreciable extent."

Mr. Hendrickson smiled. It was the smile of a kindly man who had learned to think back to cause and effect.

"I give credit to my stock book," was his answer.

"Stock book!" echoed the newcomer. "I don't think I quite understand."

"I was losing trade for several years," Mr. Hendrickson went on, "and it hurt my pride. I experienced two distinct impressions: one, that I was virtually losing life-long friends; the other, that it was my fault—mine, and mine only. So I called Charlie into consultation, and at the end of a week I hit upon the secret of our trouble."

Too many people were coming in and asking for something that we were 'just out of.' That's the worst sin that can be placed at the counter of a general store. People trade with you and make a practice of doing so, because they think they can find what they're after. Your store is a court of last resort. If they keep coming and you keep disappointing them, they lose faith in the establishment and in you. Too much of that will kill any business."

"Right!" affirmed the man in the linen duster, squaring his jaw.

"I discovered that I was not following up my lines. I was waiting for people

Recognition in Eternity

A SERMON BY REV. C. E. WINCOTT*

TEXT—Matt. 5: 4. "Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted."

LET us try to gather from the Word of God what light is cast upon a belief that most of us entertain, but that some have doubts and many have difficulties about, whether in the state of the soul as separate from the body previous to the resurrection, or in the soul united to the body after the resurrection, we shall be able to recognize relative, friend, companion, with whom we walked and took sweet counsel together.

My conviction is that we shall. My belief is that the soul of the saint now in its disembodied state holds communion with and recognizes souls of others separate from the body now in glory. And if that be so, then the beautiful Beatitude of our text, "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted," may have a wider application to mourners on earth than we are disposed to think; they may be comforted with the hopes of reunion, and with the cheering additional hope, without which reunion would be comfortless, of recognition and restoration.

Some have said: If I could only be sure that those I have lost are amidst joys unspeakable and full of glory; if only some voice could whisper from the depths or the heights, "it is well with them;" or if they could only speak one word, and say "it is well with us." You think you could be comforted. But this cannot be. The waters of the Jordan that rush along the Valley of the Shadow make no audible music. There is at present a chasm between saints on earth and saints in glory impassable to either. We have what is equally good, a lamp that strikes its beams into the future, a sunshine that projects its shafts beyond the grave; and this Book assures us, in words as certain and clear as a voice from heaven, "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord; they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

But is there a prospect not merely of reunion, but also of recognition? First, let me show what traces there are of this truth in the Old Testament; next in the New, in the teaching of our Lord and that of the Apostles; and lastly, obviate some of the objections that occur to inquiring minds.

I

I WILL turn first to the Old Testament. We all remember reading the anxiety of Abraham to find a burying-place at Machpelah for the dust of the beloved Sarah; and his eloquent and yet business-like transactions with the sons of Heth upon this subject. Also, the last request of Jacob, when the time drew near that he must die; and he called his sons and said, "I am to be gathered into my people; bury me with my fathers in the cave that is in the field of Ephron the Hittite, in the cave that is in the field of Machpelah, which is before Mamre, in the land of Canaan, which Abraham bought with the field of Ephron the Hittite for a possession of a burying-place. There they buried Abraham and Sarah his wife; there they buried Isaac and Rebekah his wife; and there I buried Leah. The purchase of the field and of the cave that is therein was from the children of Heth." Now, what was the reason of this desire of the patriarchs to find one common resting-place? It was not a morbid fancy; it was an instinct that taught them that the dead dust beneath the oaks of Mamre should one day be quickened with the pulse of everlasting life. But we go a step further: it is said, "Abraham was gathered to his people." Does that mean simply that he was buried with them? That is not true; for Terah his father died in Haran, and Abraham's body was not buried along with his. But Abraham is said to have been gathered to his people previous to his burial; and therefore it must mean his soul joined the company of them that had preceded him to glory. You recollect what Jacob said, "I will go down into the grave." That is our translation, it is properly, "The place of disembodied spirits;" "I will go to the company of disembodied spirits, to my son mourning." And when his children tried to comfort him, it is said he refused to be comforted; evidently his feeling was to mourn till he should meet his son; then the patriarch felt he should be comforted. The very fact that he expected comfort when he should meet his son in the place of departed spirits is proof that he expected then and there to recognize him. The memorable expression, too, of David is very suggestive, when his child was taken from him, "I shall go to him, though he shall not come to me." Does not that very expression of hope imply his belief that his joy would revive because he would recognize his son that God had taken from him in just and righteous chastisement?

II

IN the teaching of our blessed Lord, this reunion and recognition is assumed rather than asserted. When Jesus comforted Martha, what did he say? Not "He is happy;" that would have been so far comfort; but he said, "Thy brother shall rise again," not simply "Lazarus shall rise again;" but "thy brother." As if to show that there would be the resurrection of the visible relationship as well as the resurrection of the dead man, he says, "Thy brother shall rise again."

Speaking of the future, Jesus says, "In my Father's house are many mansions." Heaven is represented as a home; all the saved are under one sheltering roof and derive their joy from one common domestic hearthstone. If Jesus recognized those that were gathered round him below, and they recognized each other, is it possible that they should be gathered round him in glory, and one fail to recognize the other? When he says again, "Many shall come from the east, and from the west, and sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob;" will they be unconscious in whose presence they are? Will they not know that this is Isaac, and that Jacob, and that Abraham? Is not the very fulfilment of the promise necessarily recognition, so that they that heard and believed the promise may know that it is fulfilled? Moses and Elijah appeared together on the mount of transfiguration; their identity preserved, their persons recognized. The lost rich man seeth Abraham afar off; Lazarus in his bosom recognized Abraham, and Abraham recognized him.

Again, if we come to the Epistles, we find equally clear proof of a recognition: For instance, we read in the epistle to the Hebrews, "Ye," speaking of the saved in glory, "are come unto Mount Zion, and into the city of the living God, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to the innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the firstborn, which are written in heaven, and to God the Judge of all." Does not that imply recognition, communion, reunion? Paul, speaking to his converts, says, "Warning every man, and teaching every man, that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus." Does not that seem as if the Apostle expected to recognize those that he expected to present as the seals of his ministry, as the fruits of his labors?

Again, in I Thess. 4:13, we have no less conclusive evidence of the same thing. The apostle says, "I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." Now, what was the cause of the sorrow of these mourning Christians? It was the separation from their society of them they loved and held communion with on earth. What would be comfort to them? Not the general fact of the certainty of the resurrection from the dead, for they knew this; but the special fact that those that had been taken from them they should meet and mingle with and recognize again. The words prove this reference irresistibly. He says, "Them which sleep in Jesus will he bring with him; and so shall we be forever with the Lord." And again he says, "We which remain shall be caught up together with them." The idea that runs through that most beautiful passage is restoration and recognition of those that have been taken away; reunion and restored communion with them from whom they had been separated. The spring of consolation he opens to the mourning Thessalonians because of the loss of their near and dear ones, is not the resurrection, but the recognition, reunion, and restoration of the ties and bonds that death had snapped, when Christ should come again, and they all should join him, and so be for ever with the Lord.

III

THERE are objections to this great truth, and objections that have a great deal of plausibility in them. First of all, it is alleged by some that death makes so great, so awful a change, that we cannot reason from any experience that we have below to facts and phenomena which may exist in heaven or hereafter. I answer, we mistake what death does; death does not annihilate a single faculty of the mind, a single pure affection of the heart; it operates no change in the individual Christian whatever, except that of transference from grave to glory, from earth to everlasting heaven. At death, we leave behind us simply our sin, and at the resurrection day we shall be raised with all the traits of an individual and characteristic identity, sin, imperfection, tears and headaches and heartaches, being left behind for the last fire to consume.

In the second place, it has been objected that at resurrection the change will be so great in our present body, that it will be impossible to reason from what we now see or feel in the body, to anything that possibly be realized after that great and radical change. I answer when the body is raised from dead, not one fugitive expression on the face, not a glance in the eye, not one tone in the voice, not a feature that constitutes the identity and personality of the man, need or shall be altered or destroyed in the grave. "He shall change our vile bodies, that they may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." Have we any picture of Christ's glorious body? We have. "The fashion of his countenance was altered; his raiment was white and glistening; his face did shine as the sun." Well, our bodies shall be like his glorified body. But did the apostles fail to recognize him as they then beheld him? On the contrary, all the marks of his identity were there. They recognized the same Man of Sorrows, that hung upon the cross, that wept and sympathized with us, and struggled in his agony in the Garden. And when he rose from the dead himself, he said, "Touch me, and handle me; and see that a spirit hath flesh and bones, as ye see me have."

BUT it has been objected by others—and this, perhaps, the strongest objection of all, or at least the one most difficult to deal with—that if memory survive the grave, there will be and not be pain, sorrow, and bitterness in the future life, or in heaven; for shall we not miss there some that we would give all the world to meet there? And if we miss in the groups that are clad in white robes, and that are around the throne, beloved ones that we revered and loved with nature's warm sympathies on earth, will not that be a gap? Will that be agony, and sorrow, and distress? And is that compatible with the statement that in the future to come there will be neither sorrow, nor crying, nor tears, nor any more pain? I admit this is the most difficult to answer; but I submit that we are assured that all painful recollections are impossible there. We know from our own experience what may be a presentiment and prefiguration of it, that feeling of grief at the loss of near and dear ones, at first most poignant, almost intolerable, gradually subsides to resignation. And so it may be, that missing in the groups of the saved some that we could wish to see there, our regrets may so subside into resignation to God's most excellent will, that we shall be able to say, with an emphasis with which we never said before, "Thy will be done here, even as it is done in heaven."

But of this we are absolutely sure: that we shall have no feelings, desires, or sympathies that are not in perfect harmony with the will and mind of God.

It seems to me that if you were to take away that blessed thought of meeting Christians whom we have known and loved below, relatives above whom we have spent our pilgrimage with upon earth, it would take a gem from the crown of glory, a bright beam from everlasting day.

IN a few fleet years, the youngest and the healthiest and the strongest must lie down and die; in a few fleet months the aged must leave this pilgrimage of toil, this battle-field of conflict. Surely, if there be one thought that ought to dominate, that ought to be supreme and overwhelming till it is settled, is this: Will it be well with me at the judgment of Christ? How is it, I ask in the name of common sense, not to speak of the name of him whose ambassador I am, how is it that the trifles of a day in every passion and sympathy of the human heart; and that the very world for which we are here, the very end for which we are born, the safety of the soul, acceptance through the blood of sprinkling, are treated as if time were eternity, and eternity were time.

Live Christianity, speak Christianity, teach Christianity, and, above all, pray. I do not believe that a child that has been the object of a mother's prayers will ever perish. I do not believe that a husband who is the ceaseless burden of a wife's prayer at a throne of grace, will die eternally. I have a perfect faith in God as the hearer of prayer. Pray, pray, pray! And then when your prayers are answered, they will be lost in everlasting praise; and you shall meet above them with whom you held sweet communion below, and nature's ties, glorified in the light and splendors of the betterland, will be the medium of only more reciprocal delight, through Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and glory.

That Girl from Orchard Street By C. COURTENAY SAVAGE

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS

MARY ELLIS had lived the first twenty-one years of her life on Orchard Street, which lay in the slums of Westport, a suburban town, where her father, despite his occasional drinking spells, had amassed something of a competency through his blacksmith shop. Mary, as a girl, had acquired the manners and something of the reputation of the locality, then the fire of a new ideal awoke the finer nature within her. But the town while it saw, did not believe. Then the war came, and she began to work for the Red Cross; and when the United States entered the war she joined the ranks of the ministrants to the boys who were going over to fight for the freedom of the world. So well did she do this that she was selected as one of those who were to go to France, much to the surprise of some of the very respectable society ladies of Westport, who had not considered her suitable company for their sons.

CHAPTER III

IT was a clear, sun-bathed day in the late fall when Mary Ellis reached the little village in the Aisne district of Northern France, to which she had been assigned to aid in the reconstruction work. She had reached Bordeaux two days previously, and as instructed had journeyed at once to Paris. There she had talked with an American woman whose work in France had made her famous and much loved, and also with the Minister of Agriculture. She was perfectly calm. After her life in Westport, Mary found that it was easy to meet great people without fear. For a couple of hours she had chatted about the United States, about her very uneventful journey across the Atlantic, and about the work she was to do. Then she went back to her hotel and sat quietly waiting for bed time. The next morning at seven her train pulled out from one of the great stations, and went north, toward the firing-line. At noon she stepped from her railroad carriage and looked along the station for Mrs. Lovett.

It would be impossible to describe Mary Ellis's motions as she heard, and saw for the first time, work to be done in Printemps Vallée and surrounding villages. Mrs. Lovett, head of the eight American women who for almost a year had been aiding in the reconstruction work—the rebuilding of such village houses as were possible to repair, planting the fields that had been idle for three years, helping the peasantry to restock their farms, planting trees—came forward to meet the newest worker. She greeted her with frank pleasure, offering a large hand that was rough from actual work.

"One more star in our flag," she laughed. "I'm Mrs. Lovett, and you'll meet the rest of us at dinner. I suppose we should have had a band at the station to meet you, but there's so much work to do that I had to postpone my share of the weekly mending in order to wash up and come over here."

MARY smiled, but could hardly reply. Instead she watched a long line of men who had descended from a railroad car back of the one she occupied, and were now rapidly falling into line. They were as strange an assortment as she had ever seen—all of them lightly crippled, all of them in uniform. She turned to Mrs. Lovett, her eyes asking her question.

"Wounded men going to work on the reconquered territory. Probably going to the next village to mend the crossroads. Our crossroads haven't been mended, but then we are not so important as some of the towns. Not many of the troops come this way."

Mary nodded and picked up her bag. "It rather stifles one for a few minutes," Mrs. Lovett said, as she offered to carry Mary's heavy coat. "But after a few days you get used to it all. Come this way," and she started toward the back of the railroad station, a temporary affair that was little more than a covered shed for freight.

What had once been a popular tourists' highway ran close to the station. They walked on in silence, meeting few people on the road. Those that they did encounter seemed as mourners at a funeral, their faces lighting only momentarily as they greeted Mrs. Lovett. The men were either old or in uniform, the women all garbed in black. After they had gone a short distance they crossed a rude wooden bridge, under which stood a pool of muddy water.

"Germans," Mrs. Lovett pointed to the pool. "They dug the trench across the road to hinder the advance of the French army."

Mary nodded. It was only a scant quarter of a mile from the station to the group of portable wooden houses where Mary Ellis was to live and work, but in that walk she understood as never before the meaning of war. She had read of the work of the retiring houses there was a workshop used by the soldiers who occasionally helped, two barns, and a small building given over to a store.

Earlier in the fall, three of the women who had worked during the summer had returned to the United States, and as the work would not be heavy again till spring, Mary Ellis would be the only newcomer till after the new year. The nine women greeted her effusively, and gathered noisily and eagerly about the long table. As a special honor to the newest member of the group, two chickens had been killed.

"We get lots of good food, Miss Ellis," explained Helen Synon, a girl who had given up a debutante season to learn to cook, and was now teaching domestic science to the French women of the neighborhood. "But we don't have chicken every day. I worried all last night for fear that I would not cook them correctly."

Miss Synon, Mary found afterward, was the youngest member of the group. She had only been allowed to join because of a twofold ability—she could cook, and she knew how to repair an automobile.

They were a strange assortment of women, Mary decided; all of them interesting, all of them filled with the spirit of service so very essential to their work. Mrs. Lovett, the head of the party, was exactly the physical type that Mary pictured necessary to be a leader. She was about forty, a widow, and the proprietor of a girls' school in New England, which, as she explained, "was taking care of itself." She was tall, prematurely gray, with big black eyes that sparkled as she talked. Two of the other women had been school teachers; one woman, a Miss Smithers, had managed her own farm in Illinois; while the Perkins sisters, large-built women of between thirty-five and forty, were wealthy Americans who had lived in France and now welcomed the chance to work with their hands for a land they had learned to love as much as their own. These seven, together with a girl named Ruth Morgan, whom Mary liked at once, comprised the party.

The celebration, however, did not hinder the work to be done, and after dinner, while the Perkins sisters washed the dishes, Mary followed Helen Synon to the room in the next building which they were to share. As the girl asked questions of affairs at home, Mary changed from the heavy traveling suit she had been wearing into high boots, a short serviceable skirt, and a heavy sweater. Helen Synon, who had been watching her dress, nodded her head in approval.

"I think you'll like it here, Miss Ellis," she said, "and I think they'll like you. Now you can come along with me and help make soup for the community. Really, the women have suffered so much that they have forgotten how to plan nourishing meals. Good food is one of the tonics for good spirits—and I am teaching them to eat."

THAT evening, when Mary Ellis went exhausted to her bed before eight o'clock, she found that she could not sleep. She lay there while the cold moonlight streamed in through the open window, listening to the dire rumble that had started late in the afternoon and had continued ever since.

"Heavy guns," they had told her, and she, unused to their noise, had been filled with mingled fear and elation.

Heavy guns! She turned her face from the moonlight and tried to sleep, but could not. She, Mary Ellis, was within sound of the heavy guns that were to drive the Germans from France. A score of miles to the north, men were fighting, suffering, dying. She thought of Westport, snugly in bed—and she was glad that she was not there.

The sense of elation that filled her kept her awake for hours. Across the room Helen Synon slept gently, for it was no new story to her. Mary could not help but wonder, however, if the others had tossed with excitement on their first night—if their brains had been a jumble of confusion, trying to remember names,

She watched a long file of men who were rapidly falling into line

Germans; she had even seen photographs of the territory they had abandoned when retiring to their Hindenburg line; but this country sent a thrill of revenge over her—made her wish that she could use her own two hands to tear down something that these Huns held sacred. She could see plainly the work that had been done since the reoccupation of the French, and she could see ruins of homes that were too mutilated to be repaired.

"Why, it's awful!" she exclaimed finally. "What must it have been when you first came here!"

Mrs. Lovett smiled. "A man-made hell," she said quietly; "that's the only way it can be described." And at the minute Mary Ellis saw the shell hole at the crossroads.

She stopped short. The road disappeared at a right angle, and she peered over the edge as one looks down into a pit. Some thirty feet below here the water from the fall rains stood placid in the sunshine. Then she looked across the pit. It was at least fifty feet!

"This is what you meant by the work at the crossroads?"

"Yes—vandalism, isn't it? Still almost every crossroad in the Aisne district has been treated this way. Military strategy, they call it."

Mary nodded. "But it's war as they fight it," Mrs. Lovett said in a matter-of-fact tone. "Come, or we'll be late for dinner."

DINNER, Mary found, was a function that day. The women of the group occupied three small portable, one-story houses, huddled close together. The larger of those contained, besides a bedroom, a large room used for cooking, dining, and any social activities for which there was time. Besides the three

The Mind of the Man in Khaki

ONE of the signs of the times, to which we have already referred, is the unanimity with which observant writers, who have visited other lands during the progress of the Great War, predict that one of the coming changes will be a lessening of the powers of ecclesiasticism. Dr. William T. Ellis, who has come in contact with the religious changes that have been going on in many countries, writing in the Boston Evening Transcript, reviews the general upheaval which has affected the Russian church, the Armenian and Nestorian churches, the church in Germany, and also the church, in its ecclesiastical aspect, in other lands including our own. He sees radical changes coming, which will release real religion from the grasp of the octopus which corresponds to Prussianism in statecraft. Ecclesiasticism he regards as the professional proponent of churchism, sectarianism, or denominationalism. Fortunately all clergymen are not ecclesiastics. "Ecclesiasticism," he writes, "puts, either intentionally or instinctively, personal or denominational effort about the larger interests of Christianity." It makes a business of religion, and is bent upon building it up as an institution rather than as a real, vital spiritual rule of life. "Doctrines and forms and institutions are dear to it. . . . It is worldly wisdom in vestments; it is the world within the church."

With regard to the minds of the men in the trenches, he feels assured that, as a whole, they care nothing about ecclesiasticism or church historicity. He has come into personal contact with many of them. They want a church that will represent all religion—"a return to first principles, with an elementary creed and a great, helpful fraternity." These would satisfy the soldier-mind, which believes in a church of human brotherhood with Christ as its head and all of us as his earnest followers and doers of his Word.

Many other correspondents are writing in a similar vein. From Russia they write of the multitude of conflicting sects, of the spiritual stagnation of the effete Russian church, which has been a colossal hindrance rather than a help to the development of the spiritual life of the people. There is sore need of a unifying Gospel which the masses can understand. Indeed, in all lands today there is need of the teaching of Jesus Christ to revitalize the spiritual life of the peoples. They need the divine message as the Bible alone presents it.

Yet in no previous age, either in war or peace, has the Word been so widely circulated as during the last four years. Printed in over seventy languages, it has been placed in the hands of multitudes in almost all the fields of conflict. Even enemy countries have not been overlooked, for liberal supplies have been distributed in the prison camps of those countries. Together, the Bible Societies and other producing agencies have scattered over 20,000,000 Bibles and Gospels in this world-wide distribution among friend and foe alike. One Society alone has distributed in one year over 7,000,000 Scriptures. Never was there an age in which the Word of God has been so generously scattered throughout the world. Who can tell what part this gigantic Gospel distribution has played in drawing the minds of the men in the trenches—our own brave boys among the rest—to the need of a great, common, Christian creed, and the discontinuance of those petty distinctions which now divide the churches and distract many earnest, inquiring minds who are seeking the way of life?

Famine at Work

FAMINE, the grim and silent fighter who Germany hoped would help her in her conquests, has recoiled upon the Teutons. All their plans for starving the Allies have broken down. They are fed, while the Kaiser's troops, weakened in physique and morale, make only a feeble stand in the face of their invigorated enemy.

Among the German troops who fell in the great retreat, correspondents tell us there were some whose deaths were hastened by hunger—no one knows how many. Even in the Prussian capital and throughout the whole empire stalks the gaunt figure of hunger. In Austria-Hungary, the food crisis is so serious that all classes are suffering. Crime has increased to an alarming extent. Russia, Rumania, Armenia and Syria are each of them in the grip of famine, some more severely than others. Every land that Germany has touched has felt the blight. Yet only a little over a year ago, Germany was confident that famine would win the war for her—in three weeks, she boasted, her submarines would cut off the Allies' food supplies and bring England to her knees. The submarines have failed, and America's bountiful harvests are feeding the Allies, as well as supplying all our own wants. Australia's wheat supply is immense, and the U-boats are powerless to prevent its transportation.

And now the whole battle-tide has turned and the united Allied armies are driving the Huns before them. With defeat following defeat and famine waiting ahead, the outlook for the Kaiser's shattered host and the traditionally "unconquerable German sword" is full of tragic possibilities in the near future.

The Children and Their Friends

OUR fresh-air work at Mont-Lawn has just closed after a most successful season. Thousands of children of the tenements have enjoyed a refreshing holiday visit through the liberality of our readers and their friends, many of whom have long been contributors to this beautiful work. The Children's Paradise has become very dear to the members of our Christian Herald Family Circle. It is in a special sense a work of their own upbuilding. From that first opening, twenty-four years ago, up to the present time, they have never failed to respond to the appeal in behalf of the children. There are thousands of men and women today, filling useful careers, who carry in their hearts a grateful recollection of those early times—hard times in their homes of poverty—when they were enrolled among the little guests at our Children's Home.

It has been worth while to help those little folk of the tenements and to brighten their dull lives with experiences which they carry with them throughout their whole future. The songs, the lessons, the simple joys they shared, can never be forgotten; and when the opportunity offers, they do their part towards helping other children of poverty to a holiday by contributing to the Fresh-Air Fund.

We congratulate the patrons of Mont-Lawn upon the splendid success of their work, which has been a real delight to all who have had a share in it.

The Fourth Liberty Loan

ALL arrangements are now completed for the flotation of the Fourth Liberty Loan. Beginning September 28 and closing October 19, the three weeks' campaign will be one in which the energy, patriotism and liberality of the American people will have an opportunity for demonstration. The crisis of the great War is near and it is indispensable that each one of us should do our part in making victory assured. Those of us who are not called to go to the front can render most effective service by contributing to the new Liberty Loan.

Let the campaign be an overwhelming demonstration of our loyalty and liberality. Every Liberty Bond purchased in those three weeks will be a guarantee of victory—a reassurance to our boys in the trenches that the nation is back of them, not only with our hopes and our prayers, but with our entire resources, down to the last dollar if need be, to keep up the victorious progress of our troops. We have now over 1,700,000 men at the front and on the way. They are fighting our battle and giving their blood and even their lives for our sake. Their love and confidence are worth all we can give them in return and much more.

The Liberty Loan is a true test of our loyalty. Our investment is an index of the value we place upon our citizenship. Besides, from a business point of view, it is the best investment any government in the world can offer today, being backed up by the entire resources of this great republic. We advise everyone to get ready to buy bonds in the Fourth Liberty Loan to the full extent of his or her ability, and when the loan opens, help to make it a cyclonic success!

A Year Ago and Now

PICK up a daily newspaper and open it near the front page and, instead of advertisements of millinery shops, you are looking at a page of casualty lists—a page covered with the names of men who had been wounded and killed in the service of their country! As we look at those names, we forget the reason why we had originally picked up the paper and we find ourselves thinking, instead, of the service flag that is back of every name, and of the shadowed home that each service flag hung in, and of the women—the sorrowful women—to whom fall hats and similar things mean very little now. Yet only last autumn, hats and frocks and shoes wore among the vital things in many a woman's life. But this year, the women who were busy at their dressmaker, are attending Red Cross classes and driving ambulances and learning first aid. The girl who was known as the smartest dresser in her set a year ago is no proud of her record as a salesman of Liberty Bonds and Thrift Stamps. Khaki color is the popular color this fall. Woolen sweaters and socks are being seen in all fashionable places—seen in the hands of women who are knitting industriously. And nurses' caps are worn very generally, worn with an expression of tenderness and pity.

War breaks hearts and goes on breaking more hearts, but it has done one worthwhile thing. It has taken some of us who were little more than mannikins and has tested us, and burned away the surface veneer and shown to the world and to ourselves that we are real women after all.

Magazine Prices Going Up

AFTER October 1, you will have to pay more for your magazines. Unusual increases in the cost of paper, printing, engraving and clerical help, in addition to the extra postage which publishers must pay because of the new zone rate for mail magazines, have compelled many publishers to advance subscription prices. Other publishers will make similar advances shortly.

But until October 1, you can get the popular magazines through the Christian Herald at bargain prices. Even though your subscription will not expire for several months, renew now and obtain the benefit of the present prices.

A carefully selected list of magazine combinations is given on page 1070. These Money-Saving Clubs are rendered possible because of special arrangements which we have made with other publishers—but your order must be mailed not later than October 1.

We strongly urge all readers of the Christian Herald whose subscriptions have expired, and also those whose subscriptions are about to expire, to renew at once. It will shortly be necessary for us to drop from our subscription list all whose subscriptions are not paid in advance. This is a government order with which we must comply. There is now a shortage of book paper, and there will be even a great shortage. The urgent necessity of economizing in the use of paper has been brought to our attention by the War Industries Board.

Economies are to be effected in many ways, including the discontinuance of all free and exchange copies also all subscriptions which are not paid in advance so that the Christian Herald can be sent only to those who have actually paid for their subscriptions. Renewing promptly will insure the continuous receipt of the Christian Herald. Do not miss any of the present vital issues, as we shall be unable to supply back numbers.

The editors have prepared many really worthwhile things for you. We can mention but a few here—"That Girl From Orchard Street," which began last week's issue of the Christian Herald, will be followed by "All the World," a wonderful serial by Rev. Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, the author of "In His Steps." Then will come a story specially written for our readers by Grace Livingston Hill Lutz. Major Theodore Waters, Secretary of the Christian Herald, now with the Red Cross Commission in Palestine, will have a number of interesting articles on the "Redemption of the Holy Land." These articles will be amplified by the beautifully colored drawings of the Holy Land, made by David Roberts of the Royal Academy, which will appear from time to time on the covers of the Christian Herald.

Under the title of "Circling the World for Christ," Dr. Francis E. Clark, President of the Christian Endeavor Society, will tell the story of the beginnings of Christian Endeavor, and of his many world pilgrimages to which they have led. During the fall, Professor James M. Gray will contribute a concluding series of articles on Prophecy.

Can you afford to miss any of these? To make sure that you get all of them—Subscribe now.

Week-Day Holiness

SUNDAY, September 22. Zech. 14 : 20. "In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses holiness unto the Lord." Not only shall church-bells pour forth their holy intimations and their divine significance, but the bells upon the horses shall bear the same testimony in the centers of business and trade. There are holy bells ringing in the midst of common circumstances. This is a very large and health-giving sense of consecration; it not only pervades the holy place in the temple, but it includes the outer courts, and it sends forth its purifying energies into the bustling affairs of the street. We are prone to limit the holiness we seek to the floor and circumstances of the sanctuary; but here is a holiness which moves with the swift things of the thoroughfares and distinguishes the couriers of commerce. It is holiness amid the fast life of the ordinary world.

Now, holiness is always a very unimpressive weakening if it cannot face and endure the rigors and intemperies of the street. It has the inevitable paleness of all cloistered virtue. It never gets beyond the ranness of a prison plant. It is an invalid which never goes forth on daring ventures. And it was in reference to this peril of spiritual invalidism that our Lord prayed we might have deliverance—"I pray of that thou shouldst take them out of the world," that would mean an escape from hardness, and therefore the deprivation of hardihood. But our Lord purposes for his children spiritual lustiness.

How God Proves Us

MONDAY, September 23. Ps. 81 : 7. "I proved thee at the waters of Meribah." The reference here is to the incident recorded in the Book of Exodus, in which God proved Israel. The word "proved" is equivalent to "tested." A chemist who tests a substance may have no personal interest in it. A judge of jewels may have no personal interest in the gem he submits to his test. How different is the attitude of a teacher who examines a favorite scholar or of a father who tests the accomplishments or the character of his child.

There is the story of a prince of France who commanded a troop in a historic battle. His soldiers were hard pressed, and in the crisis of the battle there came reinforcements to deliver the prince and his soldiers from their imminent peril. The young man had been under his father's eye all the while. He was being proved. So, often, God proved Israel, as at Meribah. He let his chosen people fail, he let them fall, in order that they might feel their dependence upon him. So he proves us by the narrow margins of our lives, by the darkness of many a day through which we pass, by the wolves that howl at our door and the serpents that hiss at our feet. So faith develops, and so come courage, patience and hope to our souls.

It is a comfortable thought that the proving is a double one: God proves us, and we prove him. We prove how near he is and how mighty, as well as how merciful. Read again the story of "Pilgrim's Progress" if you would see how God proves his saints. He proves us for our own sakes as well as for his own. He proves us not alone for strength, but for purity and self-control. Not alone in affliction, but in prosperity, God is testing us, and in the process of testing God has his agents. Often the world is rude and even cruel to us. It is good it is so, for it is by such things we are driven back to the assurance, "I know whom I have believed."

Truth Triumphs

TUESDAY, September 24. Dan. 6 : 17. "A stone was brought and laid upon the mouth of the den; and the king sealed it with his own signet, and with the signet of his lords; that the purpose might not be changed concerning Daniel." The sealing of the den of lions in which Daniel was consigned was for the purpose of preventing an unlawful altering of Daniel's situation, by which the truth and strength of his faith were to be tested. Neither were his friends to be permitted to spirit him away before harm was done to him by the animals, nor were his enemies to be allowed to execute some foul play upon Daniel, if the lions could spare him, as the king, it seems, hoped they could. The outcome of the affair broke up completely the hideous plot of Daniel's enemies and gloriously vindicated Daniel's faith. Naturally this incident in Old Testament history carries our thought forward to the tomb in the garden of Joseph of Arimathea, which was sealed with the great seal of the synagogue to prevent fraud being practiced on the body of Jesus. Pilate had laughed the fear of the highpriests to scorn: these worthies, he mused, are actually afraid of a dead man. Now, the highpriests, too, knew that Jesus was dead; but they were troubled with the thought that he might not stay dead, because he had said he would not. In either instance the seal affixed amounted to a solemn commitment of a very important matter to God. Here again, and in a far more glorious manner, truth triumphed over lies.

God has sealed his believers with the Holy Spirit of promise, to secure them from being tampered with by the wicked designs of their enemies. His purposes concerning them are not to be thwarted by the cunning and malice of their foes. Let a situation ever so hopeless be created against a believer by his enemies, the Lord will bring him safely out of his worst predicaments, and the very scheme which the enemies have thought out for the believer's destruction will become the instrument for their own overthrow. God takes the cunning in their own craftiness.

Faith

WEDNESDAY, September 25. John 18 : 37. "To this end was I born, that I should bear witness unto the truth." God's truth is the glory of himself and his universe. A living faith in divine truth is the ideal of human attainment. Faith is the connecting link between man and God. To say with Paul, "I have kept the faith," is the climax of human triumph. This is the victory that overcomes the world, even your faith. Faith in the truth makes one a possessor of the truth and a witness for the truth. Christ is truth incarnate; truth illustrated by life.

Franklin, Morse, Edison, Bell and Marconi had faith in electrical energy. They showed their faith by their wonderful works—illuminating and propelling a world. Paul fills his gallery of immortals with the heroes of faith; they believed in the divine electricity of spiritual power. Their fingers of faith touched the batteries of heaven till the baptism of fire fell upon them, glorifying their spirits, enduing their minds with power to propagate the Gospel among all mankind.

Faith is the bridge across material discoveries, and spans as well the chasm between the human and the divine. Faith believes nature and nature's God. It is the eye of the soul, seeing infinitely beyond the eye of the body. It is the evidence of things not seen, the assurance of things hoped for. Faith beholds the footsteps of the Infinite, treading the battlefields of war-stricken countries after peace prevails. Losing faith in humanity, in organized government, makes one repose more perfect faith in the most high God, whose Son, Jesus Christ, will one day absorb all other kingdoms into his kingdom and reign without a rival in the new heavens and the new earth. May the church of Christ believe in the mighty spiritual truths which God has promised his children and become witnesses of him unto the uttermost parts of the earth!

Faith's Witnesses

THURSDAY, September 26. Heb. 12 : 1. "Wherefore, seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us." There are three types of character which all the world admires—the wise, the brave, and the good. The eleventh chapter of Hebrews contains a long list of heroes and heroines who may be classified under one or other of these titles. The wise man has a mind and uses it. The brave man has a will and asserts it. The good man has a heart and keeps it pure. Moses represents the wise, Gideon the brave, and Enoch the good.

It is unfortunate that the twelfth chapter is separated from the eleventh. It is really a continuance. Mark the "wherefore." The word "witnesses" may not improperly be translated "heroes," although the primary significance of the word has reference to testimony. The argument is, since the way has been prepared for us by a great army of heroes, it should be easier for us to be heroic. The plea is, "Let us also be witnesses." Surely there is inspiration in the lives of the good and the great. And yet we are not to look either to Moses, Gideon or Enoch, but to Another. Moses was wise, but not always brave and good. Gideon was brave, but not always wise. Enoch was good, but not much is said of his wisdom. Jesus is both good and brave and wise. He is the Captain of our salvation. Sidney Lanier calls Jesus "good Paragon, thou crystal Christ." Why should we look to Jesus? "The barren fig-tree beholds the fruitful fig-tree and becomes itself fruitful"—so runs an Oriental proverb. Paul puts it better: "Beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, we are changed into the same image."

The One Way

FRIDAY, September 27. John 3 : 3. "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Just from what motive Nicodemus sought his faint-hearted interview with the Lord, we cannot tell. It is likely, however, that the great events which were transpiring in Judea at that time had some connection with his coming to Jesus. Without replying directly to the reverent greeting of his learned visitor, the Lord refers at once to the baptism of John, which was at that time and for many years after a mooted question among the Jews. For the expression "water and spirit," which the Lord uses during his conversation with Nicodemus, is an unmistakable reference to baptism. Now John had in strong terms denounced the ruling church party among the Jews, going even so far as to call them a generation of vipers. Luke tells us that the Pharisees showed contempt for the baptism of John. It is possible that Nicodemus also disdained the terms which John laid down for admission to the kingdom of God. It seemed almost an insult to these men from the upper classes of Jewish society to be treated on a level with soldiers, publicans, and the lowest classes of Jewry. Their pride revolted from the idea. Accordingly, the Lord finds it necessary to reinforce the teaching of his faithful forerunner with the solemn assertion in our text. This assertion discounts heavily against all natural fitness for the kingdom of God supposed to exist in men. Nicodemus was outwardly an upright man and even occupied a high rank in the Jewish Church. Perhaps he was silently appealing to the law and traditions which he had kept. The Lord tells him in effect: You have not even begun to be fit for the kingdom. Do not think that the religion which I have come to proclaim merely wishes to give you a little supplementary advice regarding spiritual matters, or to recommend to you a few more works which are still lacking to your perfection. No, I am come to begin the good work in you. There is not so much as a seed or rootlet of spiritual worth in you. Your former works must be renounced, and you must enter upon a new phase of living. You must be made all over again, not physically but spiritually, because you are dead in trespasses and sins.

The Door

SATURDAY, September 28. 1 Thess. 4 : 14. "Them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." What a beautiful way to refer to death! "He giveth his beloved sleep"—"and Stephen fell asleep." Sleep is a period of rest from which one awakes refreshed.

Asleep in Jesus! blessed sleep!
From which none ever wakes to weep!

We see our Pilot face to face when we awake in his likeness and we hear his call, "Come, ye blessed, to the rest of the people of God."

After the slumber, the golden door of infinite opportunity opens to the soul. The door of death opens into the realm of life; it is entered walking through the dark valley and the shadows. The dark background of death becomes luminous with glorious light. Dying clears the vision, opening up the vistas of heavenly habitations. Death is not extinction, but an exodus into a new world. It is a bend in the river of life, flowing on toward the ocean of love divine. It is being translated from the known to the unknown by Him whom we love and trust. We willingly burn all the bridges as we pass death's valley, for we shall not return that way again. Death dies as you pass him by; there is no more death; the last enemy is destroyed. Therefore, death's door at the end of life is a blessing; it is the only way out into the mountains of eternity. We should journey joyously, knowing that we shall pass through those gates of life, having a new birth of larger freedom and richer being.

We knew nothing of this world when we entered life, but we do know something of the mansions and beauties of the eternal life before us, for the King has revealed little flashes of glory when the door was ajar, as Jesus passed into the heavens. He has also left us his wonderful Words of Life in the Holy Scriptures and sent the Comforter to reveal many beautiful views of the glory land. Jesus himself will one day lift up the gates and open the everlasting doors into his Father's eternal worlds.

Making Homes Outside the Camps

By MARGARET WIDDEMER

THE work of the War Camp Community Service is described by the government as being "to stimulate the morale and preserve the physical well-being" of our soldiers, sailors and marines outside the camps. But as a matter of fact you might as well try to describe in one sentence the things a busy wife and mother does for her family as the things the War Camp Community Service does for its charges; for its activities are as many and as heterogeneous as any mother's. It furnishes houses, it looks after meals, it cleans up, it teaches knitting and sewing, it entertains its children, it amuses them, it looks after them—in short, it is nearly a complete parallel in its line, which is the coordination of the community with the soldier, of the thousand and one activities of a housekeeper.

This sounds very domestic. But what is the world, after all, but a big house to be kept? And under what classification could you put a service that has a finger in pretty nearly every pie, from the town Ladies' Aid to the Elks and the Glee Club, not forgetting the railroad stations and the busses and boarding-houses? Its cafeterias, its Travelers' Aid, its Home Hospitality work, its entertainment bureaus, its Army and Navy Clubs, its Community Houses, and a dozen other activities that keep the soldier and the community connected, are more like the things a busy housewife does than they are like anything else one can think of.

It doesn't stop at looking after the soldiers, you see. Or rather, in looking after the soldiers, it finds that the boys automatically connect with the girls and mothers and fathers. And so in the towns near Camp

Sherman, for instance, it is working with the Girls' Patriotic Leagues, building up clubs and societies and "sets" of girls into a coordinated body with something to do and a reason for doing it.

For it is very lonesome at home, now the boys are

The girls want to do everything they can for our soldiers if they only know how. So, as a matter of fact, we do all. We only need to be shown.

The Community Service is here to do the showing whenever and wherever the girls ask it.

A quiet corner in a typical Hostess House gathered into camps. And on the other hand, near the camps are too many boys, and a disease called "khaki-itis" by experts is apt to rage among the younger girls. So the Patriotic Leagues are formed, as they should be formed all over, whether there are soldiers near or gaps where they used to be. There is a great deal of knitting to do. So the War Camp Community Service is sending out leaders, just girls like the other girls they teach, to form clubs for knitting. And not only knitting. When you sing you're a lot happier even if you were sort of lonesome before. So all through the communities, North, South, East and West, are going books of songs and a concerted movement to have the girls meet to sing.

It showed the people in Ohio, for instance, that Community House was needed at the camp in their state. They could expect their eager good-will to help the boys who were going away from them, by welcoming the relatives of the boys who were sent to Camp Sherman. And so they gave money at the time and good-will and the Community House stands today at the center of the camp, a spacious comfortable building with big fireplaces and easy chairs and couches, a building standing two stories high with sleeping-quarters above, and restaurant and bar below. It is Hostess House, post office, amusement hall; a community center which will be in use long after the war, and is now one of the biggest links between the soldiers and their homes.

The Community Service here is doing well its office of linking the homes near the camps with the soldiers; and it, with the other Community Service units all over America, three hundred and more of them, is linking the whole country together in one big service of good-will and friendliness.

When you help the Community Service with money or work you are helping the boy you have sent off, or some other mother's boy, to escape loneliness and the homesickness which is a soldier's worst enemy in training-camp or trench; for it is morale which wins or loses battles, and morale and homesickness cannot exist together.

HERBERT HOOVER has returned from Europe where he conferred with the food chiefs of England and France. He brings back this word:

"Our complete fulfillment of last year's promises in food and our assurance to furnish even larger supplies this next year, removed from them the last fear of hunger."

There are four chief items of food which this country is sending to our allies: fats, beef products, cereals, and sugar. The first two of these are products of the American packing plants.

The quantities of fats and meat products which are being sent to Europe are nearly past the comprehension of the layman. The orders for fats and for meats are such as were never dreamed of before the war. Thanks to the organizations built up by the great American packers, the food requirements of Europe have been met and will continue to be met. The packers' particular bit in the winning of the war is assuring the food supplies that mean life to the soldiers on the firing line and the civilians at home.

Charles McCarthy, representative of the Food Administration, stated recently that at least one hog out of every four raised in America is being sent to the Allies; that the shipments of meats are made up of beef, mutton, pork, and the various products of the packers, and that supplies are handled on a colossal scale, of which the public has little conception.

Shipments of meat are going to the Allies and to our expeditionary forces at the rate of 15,000 pounds a minute during the ten-hour work-day at eastern ports. That means 9,000,000 pounds a day. Shipments, of course, are not so well distributed as the above daily average might indicate. They are regulated by available ships. The ship movements are irregular and there are times when numbers of them put into port together and want cargoes immediately. It is in meeting such sudden demands that the packing industry has distinguished itself from other industries.

For example: one day not long ago, shipping space for a considerable quantity of food became available on a few hours' notice. The government authorities in Washington wired to Chicago packing concerns to begin shipping meat at seaboard at the rate of 200 cars a day. Such an order had never been dreamed of before. But the packers delivered the goods, and kept it up till the government wired the stop order.

On several occasions, the government buying agents have summoned representatives of the big packers into conference and then told them that bacon was wanted in untold amounts. "How much can you supply?" was the query directed at each packer representative and some prodigious orders have been given on that basis.

Recently the British government ordered 250,000,000 pounds of meat to be delivered in three weeks. The final shipments were made well within the time limit.

The whole story of packer usefulness in winning the war is not confined to supplying meats, however. For instance, the Armour Sandpaper Works received an order by wire for an enormous amount of its product—"at the earliest possible moment." The factory buckled down to the task, ran off 18 miles of sandpaper a yard wide, dried it, cut it up, packed it and shipped it before the following morning. Fourteen miles more followed the next day.

It was packer experts who solved one of the most important problems incident to supplying our men with gas masks. It is a packer product that is used to staunch the flow of blood from the wounds of our soldiers; it is a packer product which is used to sew up the wounds; the soap with which the soldiers clean up after their turn in the trenches is a packer product; the glue which figures largely in the manufacture of airplanes comes from the packers; the aviators' sheep pelt coats are packer products; glycerine for use in explosives, animal oil for lubricating purposes and leather for harness, puttees and the like come largely from packing houses.

War has doubled the volume of business done by the largest packers and has trebled the amount of capital necessary to meet current obligations. But in spite of this, the industry has not cracked under the war strain, and today it is meeting every demand made upon it by the government and by the Allies. Though dealing with a highly perishable article requiring expert handling and refrigeration, there is no record of complaint, and investigators have termed the United States army "the best fed army in the world."

The profits for this service are limited by the government to two and a half cents on the dollar of sales and the turn-over must not be so frequent that it results in a per annum profit of more than nine percent on the money actually invested and utilized in the meat food business. It works out that packers' profits represent a return of one-quarter of one cent per pound of product, and that millions can be earned at that rate merely bears witness to the wonderful volume of the business transacted.

A REMARKABLE Bible conference recently closed at Bible School Park, a suburb of Binghamton, N. Y. Delegations came by automobile from cities as far distant as Syracuse on the north and Wilkes-Barre on the south. A large number of young women were in attendance. Among the speakers present were Dean Pettingill, of the Philadelphia School of the Bible; O. R. Palmer, home secretary of the African Inland Mission; Ralph C. Norton, from the Belgian trenches; Henry C. Crowell, of Denver; Rev. R. E. Neighbor, D. D., of Atlanta, Ga.; and Evangelists E. G. Crabill and Harlow Parsons.

The Great War Revenue Bill

THE various items of the revenue bill to be reported to Congress were finally agreed to on August 30 and the committee completed its report, which is presented to the House on September 3. The bill as drawn is expected to raise $8,012,792,000, chiefly through taxes on war prosperity. Eighty per cent. of all war profits are to be turned to the national treasury unless a greater collection will result from the application of the excess profits tax with rates ranging from 35 per cent. to 7 per cent., the highest rate applying to profits exceeding 20 per cent. of invested capital. Taxable incomes below $4,000 are exempted as to single and married men remain as in the present law) will pay 6 per cent., incomes above $4,000 will pay a normal tax of 12 per cent. with taxes on the larger incomes beginning at 2 per cent. on incomes of $5,000 to $500 and reaching 65 per cent. on incomes over $5,000,000 a year. No distinction is made between earned and unearned incomes. Internal revenue taxes are practically doubled. Luxuries will be taxed. Owners of automobiles will pay a tax of $10 on cars of less than 23 horsepower, $20 on cars from 23 to 30 horsepower, the tax ranging to $50 on cars above 40 horsepower. Taxes on railway fares, telephone calls, theater admission and club dues are increased.

It is apparent that the bill will meet with much opposition in both houses, but particularly in the Senate. Senator Smoot, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, on September 4 characterized the bill as a "gigantic absurdity." It is certain that the excess profits tax will be lowered and its manner of application modified. Secretary McAdoo has declared that the bill would tax many corporations out of existence. The bill is so drawn that war profits as such will be taxed only when earned by corporations. The Senate Committee will hold extended hearings and will probably rewrite the bill. It is probable that a consumption tax will be levied on all articles selling at retail above a certain price; $1.00 has been mentioned as the minimum. No attempt has been made, so far as reports give any indication, to revise the Postal Zone rates of last year's revenue bill.

How the Allies March to Battle

IN a cable letter to the New York Times, Philip Gibbs, the famous war correspondent, gives this vivid description of the onward march of the victorious Allies who are driving the Huns before them along the whole battle-front in France. There has probably been no more brilliantly realistic piece of war literature than these four paragraphs present:

"It is an astounding pageant, these hundreds of thousands of men—English, Welsh, Canadians, Scottish and Australians—all moving in a long-reaching line with horses and guns and transport along tracks over old battle-fields, going forward mile by mile very slowly because of the surge of traffic over narrow ways, but never stopping.

"Dust rises from these moving legions in brownish clouds which the wind rises above their steel helmets, and through this dust, in which the sun is shining hotly, there is a vision of brown masses of men with the glint of steel on rifles and helmets and twinkling colors, red and blue and green, of staff badges and pennons.

"Every man marches in a white mask of dust through which his eyes shine. Dispatch riders are threading their way through long lines of transport. The endless columns of lorries, field batteries, and gun horses are grotesque, like millers all floured from head to feet. The horses are superb and in splendid form, as though from an exhibition, and it goes to the heart to see so many lying dead on the fields after the recent battles.

"There is a great music of war over all this scene. Scottish battalions go forward to the fighting line led part of the way by their pipers, and across the battle-fields come the wild cry of the pibroch and the drone of many pipes. The English battalions are marching with brass bands playing old English marching tunes, and, between whistles, merry bursts of ragtime. The crunching of gun wheels over rough ground, officers shouting orders to their men, the hooting of lorry horns and motor horns, and an incessant hum of airplanes overhead—all make up a symphony which has a song of triumph in its theme."

Missionaries in Khaki

THE life of the world hangs in the balance. This war for the freedom of humanity means to the nations what our Civil War meant to America—the birth of the world. As a life is prolonged and a broken, diseased body made strong again only by the pain of a surgeon's life, so a broken, sinful world must be healed only by bloodshed and the clash of steel and fire. A soldier's mission, then, to the battlefields of France, is as a missionary in khaki, with the surgeon's knife and steel to help heal the world's diseases.

It is not for us to understand why God has chosen war as a punishment for his people, or why we personally must take part in the carnage. "God works in a mysterious way his wonders to perform." Suffice it to know that the God who was with us in civilian clothes is with us in the uniform of our country.

Consider what the mobilization of the young manhood of a nation in an organization on the same common level will mean. All classes have one goal in view, Christian, unbeliever, the educated, the ignorant, the wealthy and the poor, shoulder to shoulder for the accomplishment of the same great purpose, that democracy and right may not perish from the earth. Discipline is that which makes an army out of a mob. It is a common sight to see a number of soldiers, after a strenuous day's drill on the field, after "Lights Out" in the squad-rooms, reading their Bibles true to a Christian mother's teaching and the Sunday school training received back home. And they are always the soldiers who are respected by their comrades.

Are not such things bound to influence the lives of others? To be sure, temptation abounds, and it's the acid test; but the boys will come out true men, wiser and more sober citizens. Or in "No Man's Land" in the blackness of some night, with the possibilities of death in the very atmosphere, with the heavens overhead and nothing but distorted nature all about, will it not make them think deeply, and bring them to a close relation to their Maker? Will they not realize as never before how helpless they are, how dependent upon God? What will it mean when whole nations cooperate as one in the suppression of wrong; when Christian nations fight side by side with the heathen? Missionaries of the Cross in khaki, yes! and with a mission that is as God-sent as those whose hearts have been moved to give their all to the Master's service. There is a service dedicated through a passionate love for humanity and a zeal to do their bit for Christ's Kingdom; but the soldier's is part of God's plan as well. They, too, are his missionaries.

The soldier's task is a big and hard one, he is often discouraged; though the spirit of the crowd does not permit much melancholy, he is often sorely tempted. He welcomes and needs the assurance from loved ones back home that he is not forgotten. He needs to be told that he is doing his duty—that he has the prayers of those he loves; he needs to be reminded that he is engaged in a worthy, noble work, and thus he will be spurred to accomplish his task as a missionary in khaki. That Girl from Orchard Street wondering at the efficiency that a handful of woman and a small company of soldiers had been able to devise from chaos.

Finally, when her tense nerves could stand the wakefulness no longer, Mary Ellis reached over the side of the bed and found her shoes and stockings. She drew these on; also the heavy clothes that she had worn that afternoon. When she was fully dressed, she threw her big coat about her and noiselessly crossed to the door.

When she was outside, Mary stood for several minutes, drinking in deep breaths of the cool air, and then, as she had not seen the orchard which had been planted that summer, she struck off across the fields.

MARY ELLIS walked slowly, not even thinking—her mind absorbed by the beauty of the night. When she reached the orchard, she stood aghast at the murdered trees. It was as if she had seen some living thing cut down in cold blood. She noted where some of the ruined tree trunks had been chopped into kindling, and her eyes filled with tears as she saw row after row of newly planted trees that would some day bear fruit.

She turned, and was wandering aimlessly back in the direction in which she had come, when a sudden sense of being watched came over her. She was not frightened, though she was startled. With cool precision she walked several feet and then turned quickly. As she did so, a man's figure slid into the shadow of a wrecked apple tree.

Mary stood for several seconds, waiting. Through her mind flashed thoughts of spies, and she wished that she had carried the little revolver she had bought in the States. Then she might have tried to effect a capture. She laughed, thinking she was probably mistaken. Finally, not knowing what else to do, she walked quickly toward the house.

As she went, she devised a plan. The moonlight was so bright that the shadows it cast were almost black. Therefore, when she came close to the first of the huddled buildings, she slid into the shadows and waited. Perhaps, she told herself, there had been no man; at any rate she could see if she were followed, and if the man's actions were suspicious. The building by which she crouched gave a clear view of the path over which she had walked, and her waiting eyes were rewarded when, in a minute's time, a man walked boldly in her direction. When he was about a hundred yards from where she stood, he stopped. He was tall and very straight, though she could not see his features, for he wore a long military cape, and it muffled the lower part of his face. He stood motionless for several minutes; then, with cool deliberation, he extended one arm from his cloak and looked at the watch on his wrist. He walked a score of feet closer to the building and halted. He did this twice, till he was so close that Mary felt that he must see her. Finally, when she could stand the strain no longer, she stepped out into the moonlight, boldly, a French phrase on her lips.

The man started back.

"I thought you did not enter the buildings—" he stopped suddenly.

"No," Mary said quickly. "And what are you doing here?" She did not know why she spoke, but all the authority she could command was placed in her words.

The man laughed.

"Pardon me." This time he spoke in perfect English. "You must be the new young lady that came today. Had I remembered your advent, I should not have followed."

WITH a sudden move he threw back his cloak, and disclosed the uniform of an officer of the French infantry.

"Yes, I came today," Mary said slowly. "And you—you are on duty here?"

"Yes."

"And I suppose—" Mary hesitated.

"I suppose you were guarding the orchards?"

"Exactly."

"Well, you frightened me; perhaps you've made me sleepy. Good-night and she walked away."

"Wait!" the man called after her. "Please, Miss Ellis, don't tell any one of meeting me. The next time we see one another let it be as strangers."

Mary's eyes narrowed to two slits.

"How did you know that I am Mary Ellis?" she asked quickly. "And how do you happen to speak such perfect English?" The suspicion she implied was very evident.

"Please, Miss Ellis, as one who loves France, forget that you have seen me. You have a trust now—bigger than the building ruined villages. Good-night and he swung his cap low."

As he straightened up, and his face showed clear in the moonlight, Mary Ellis's heart gave a great leap. It was as if this man had sprung to life from a vague picture that she had carried in her subconscious mind for years. Involuntarily she moved a step forward as if to be sure that he were real. She felt the swift rush of her blood as mounted to her temples and the fiercer beating of her pulse as she saw the forehead, the shock of black curly hair, the clear eyes that seemed to search her very soul. Scoff if you will, the of you for whom romance has never held a sudden thrill, for whom a faith in the passing crowd has never meant more than a face. Mary Ellis did not know it, but love had come to her from the night. Later she was to realize the fact—now she only knew that man had ever seemed so wonderful to her—now she knew and realized with a sudden blush of embarrassment, that she was staring at this man as she had never looked at any man before. She stepped backward, lowering her head as if to cover her confusion.

"Good night," she said quickly. And she almost ran toward the door of the house. Noiselessly she undressed and climbed into bed.

She was suddenly tired; the reaction from the exciting day came swiftly, and hers was a dreamless sleep.

The sun was streaming across the floor, and Helen Synon was dressed and ready for work before Mary awoke.

"Wake up!" Helen Synon cried. "There's a lot to live for—work and a sort of things."

Mary threw back the covers. The first thought that came to her was that with the new day she could meet the man she had met in the orchard.

CHAPTER IV

IN the next few days Mary Ellis learned much in a general way of the labors performed by the little band of American women who had undertaken the reconstruction work at Printemps Vallée. Eventually she was to take over the work among the children; but at first it had been decided that she should see the entire work of the community. So for a few hours each day she worked in the poultry yard, about the cow barns, in the big room that served as a community kitchen, or perhaps helped box and ship some of the foodstuffs that had been raised the previous summer, stored in cellars, and was now being sent to the hungry in the nearby towns; and, as she went about the work, Mary watched constantly for the young Frenchman she had encountered in the orchard the first night. He was nowhere to be seen.

She had looked for him the first day as one anticipating a pleasure. When at the end of the day she had seen most of the people in the village, she had consoled herself with the fact that man on duty all night must sleep in the daytime.

But as one day swiftly followed another, and she did not meet him, and heard no reference made to men on night duty, she became anxious. She found herself wondering if he were real. Could he have been a fancy of her tired brain? Hardly; for he had smiled and spoken her name. Gradually, as the days passed, she knew that she could never know contentment until she found him. The love that had been born that night became crystalline—a reality; and it burned with a longing that was akin to pain.

"Do you have many visitors?" she asked Helen Synon one day.

"Visitors? To the devastated districts in France? No; there are plenty of people who would like to come poking their noses in here, but only an occasional official, French or otherwise, comes to see us. And we never make any ceremony. Mrs. Lovett takes them around, and we have them to dinner."

"Oh!"

ANOTHER time, watching a small body of troops on their way to mend the roads, she tried different tactics.

"I suppose in the spring we see plenty of men on the way to the front."

"France is filled with military men."

"Do the soldiers that work here remain with us all summer?"

"Mercy, no! In the summer we have big batches of fellows working in the fields for five days, then they go up to the front for twenty-five. It is a constantly shifting body that helps us with the crops."

"But surely, some man, some officer, must be at the head of this work. Haven't they a military man who is always here, so as to tell each fresh batch of soldiers about their work in the fields?"

"No, that isn't needed, Miss Ellis. The men of France love their land too well to need any one to force them to work, and they are born farmers. Mrs. Lovett tells them what she wants done, and they do it."

Mary nodded.

Another week passed. A light snow-fall had come swirling out of the north, and covered the ground, making the fields that had been wrecked by shell holes lie calm and beautiful under their covering of white. Mary Ellis had started her own work, and each morning she went to the basement of the little stone church, where the children of the village gathered about her. She taught them as best she could the simple rudiments of an education, but above all she tried to teach them to smile, to play, to laugh, and to do simple work. Sometimes on the rare occasions when he could be spared from other work Captain Michael helped her.

CAPTAIN MICHAEL was over sixty, and in reality he was no captain, but a private in the Red Cross forces in France. The title had been an honorary one, conferred by those who knew and loved him. He had been born in Ireland, and drifted about the world until, at forty, he had settled in France. A small fortune was fattened by rural sketches that sold readily to the magazines in England and America.

At the outbreak of the war he had volunteered his services, and had been refused. He had persisted, and the American Red Cross, forming its first eanteen unit, was glad to include in it a man so thoroughly conversant with France and her soldiers.

Captain Michael—his unused surname was Gaffney—had served two years and had been wounded by a bomb which had been dropped on his eanteen. There had been months in a hospital, and now he was lame. Still, in spite of it all, he was straight as a boy, and his face was always wrinkled with a kindly, determined smile. Eager to go back to work, he had been glad of the chance to represent the Red Cross at Printemps Vallée, even though the work was humbler in comparison to the labors he had done. Mary Ellis had liked him that first morning when he had come into the basement room, knocking the snow from his boots.

Once, after a long afternoon spent in teaching three little girls to sew, she found herself alone with Captain Michael. He was writing, at the small table, a lengthy letter of importance—to judge by the care he was giving each sentence—and as she gathered up the materials that had been used during the afternoon she wondered if she dared speak to him of the mysterious man of the apple orchards. Had she seen the man about the village on the morning following their midnight encounter, she would have given no further thought to their original meeting. But she had not met him; she heard no reference to him; and into her mind had come a great growing suspicion that he was not what he had pretended to be.

A spy! Yes, that was what Mary Ellis feared! What he was doing so far from the front, or what there was in the village of Printemps Vallée to attract him, was something she could not fathom. Finally she went across the room and stood beside the table.

"Good-night," Captain Michael said without looking up.

Mary hesitated. Into her mind flashed the man's face as it had glowed in the moonlight.

"Good-night," she said softly, but even then she did not move.

Captain Michael put down his pen.

"There is something that you wish to say to me?" he asked softly, and glanced up into her face.

"Yes—and no."

"You mean that you are undecided?"

She nodded.

"It is of a man I met; I am worried, because I am not sure. He was wonderful to look on; he had big clear eyes that stared at you, a high forehead, he was tall and clean-cut."

"Ah! And he did something mysterious? Nothing that was worse?"

"Captain, you are wonderful. Yes, something mysterious; and I—I liked him so much that—" she stopped.

"Faith—have faith. He made you promise not to tell of the meeting?"

She nodded.

"That is France of today. There are traitors—spies that go their way among us in strange garbs; but we must believe the best until we have proof. France of today is like a story book. Things happen that have never happened before in all the world; and you must have faith."

"Thank you," she said simply.

"Good night." And she went quickly from the room.

The Martyrs of the East

TALCOTT WILLIAMS, director of the School of Journalism on the Pulitzer Foundation in Columbia University, at the International Sunday School Association in Buffalo on Tuesday evening, June 25, said in part:

"The massacred Armenians, Greeks and Syrians in Bible lands number at least a million and a quarter, and those whose lives are ruined, their health broken, and their hope destroyed, with bitter memories to remain for all their days, number at least two million more. These massacres are not due to fanaticism. They have not come because of jealousies between races. They have not at bottom even the poor excuse that they arise from the policy of the Turks to root out all other nations. The last motive undoubtedly exists. It has been quickened into a devouring flame by the plots and plans of the Imperial German Government.

"Every one of those slain in the greatest crime of the century and one of the greatest of all days, is a martyr not only for Christianity but for freedom. Throughout all Southeastern Europe and Southwestern Asia, from the borders of Austria down to the Persian Gulf and Red Sea, and from the Mediterranean to the deserts of Persia, sword and flame, massacre and deportation, starvation and diseases that follow famine, have been deliberately set in motion by the Imperial German government, on plans organized in Berlin and executed against all the lesser Slav lands, over the Balkans to Turkey.

"Christianity and our patriotism, the necessity we are under of protecting those who will support freedom in the lauds which we are to free, call us to save the Armenians, Syrians and Greeks from extinction, and to continue this war until the wrath of God and the vengeance of divine justice are inflicted on the murderers of these helpless people, to the end that neither Christianity nor liberty may disappear from the lands where Christ gathered little children to his bosom in the first Sunday school class consecrated to his name, and Paul preached as the first missionary of faith in Jesus."

What one package of Gold Dust taught M. D. C.

ONE of our employees suggested that it would be interesting to learn just how many dishes one package of Gold Dust would wash.

So we arranged to have Mrs. C—, a house-keeping friend of ours, find out. We gave her the smallest size package of Gold Dust and this word of advice: "Use just the right amount of Gold Dust—a spoonful to a dishpan of water."

She took both home.

Some days later Mrs. C— sent us a package of slips, several of which are photographed here. Each slip showed the dishes washed after one meal.

These slips showed, too, that Mrs. C—, who lives in New York, was certainly competent to vote. For she had succeeded in getting her husband, "R. J. C. Jr." to wash the dinner dishes every single night.

When we had "added" our slips we found that one package of Gold Dust had washed 625 articles, as follows:

54 saucers	17 serving dishes
51 cups	and platters
79 plates	145 spoons
39 glasses	65 knives
45 bowls	47 forks
72 pots, pans and kitchen things	7 pitchers
	4 bottles

And, as Mrs. C— volunteered, washed them all quicker and cleaner. But being normally inquisitive, she wanted to know—"Why?"

We'll give you the same simple explanation we gave her:

"Grease is what sticks and makes the dishes hard to wash. Gold Dust dissolves this grease quicker and better than soap."

Now, why don't you put Gold Dust in your dishpan and put in less time at your kitchen sink. But don't expect a great lather of suds—Gold Dust cleans in its own quick way.

Questions and Answers

ANXIOUS. Is there any hope for a backslider?

See Heb. 10: 26-29; John 6: 37; Heb. 6: 4-6, and 1 John 1: 9. The passage in Heb. 10 refers to those who sin after receiving "full knowledge" of the truth (see 1 Tim. 2: 4), and who, after having been "enlightened" and tasting a certain measure of grace and the spirit of truth (see John 14: 17-29), apostatize to Judaism or infidelity. Such is not a sin of ignorance or error, but the result of moral wickedness, or a deliberate sin against the Spirit—a presumptuous sin against Christ's redemptive work for us. Having known the one sacrifice for sin, and having a certain experience of the efficacy of that sacrifice, they have now rejected it. In Heb. 6: 4-6 the same idea is emphasized. Such sinners crucify Christ anew, instead of crucifying the world (see Gal. 6: 14). The passage in John 6: 37 expresses the glorious certainty of eternal life to those who believe and stand firm—those who are given Him of the Father and who come to Him with full surrender. Not the simply willing, but the actually faithful; not the waverers, but the true and abiding, are to realize the promise. In the backslider there has been no complete dedication, otherwise there would be no apostasy. 1 John 1: 9 emphasizes the assurance of forgiveness and acceptance of the faithful ones. Concerning the possibilities of a return to Christ on the part of a backslider, we can only assert that what to man may and often does seem impossible is possible with God, and that his grace is boundless. Peter backslid in a most grievous way, and yet was forgiven. By a miracle of divine grace, the backslider, although beyond human hope of recall, may in God's abundant mercy find refuge and forgiveness.

P., Yorkshire, Ohio. In Rom. 4: 19 the apostle is citing Abraham's example of faith in God and his promises. Abraham against hope believed in hope. Although he took all the adverse circumstances into account, yet he wavered not. His faith might have been weakened by the long delay or by the infirmities of his advanced age, which made the fulfillment of the promise seem impossible; but he hoped on by faith, and, faith conquering, he had his fulfillment. Abraham's example is for us all—no matter how impossible God's promises may seem of fulfillment, our faith will remove mountains higher than were Abraham's. As ye believe, ye shall receive.

Miss J. A., Adel, Iowa. Your case is like that of thousands of others, who are sorrowing for their dear ones who may be in danger. But you and others are workers in this great common cause of service for mankind, to free it once and for all from the greatest of human curses. We cannot feel that this war is a punishment. On the contrary, it is a glorious opportunity and a duty for us to serve and give our all, that the world may be able to live in peace and happiness.

Mrs. C. H. H., Georgetown, Texas. We have not statistics to show what percentage of Protestants in America practice close communion, but believe the percentage is growing less. The idea of a common ground on which all Protestants can meet is gaining rapidly. God speed the day when we may have one church as we have but one Master and Lord over all.

J. M., Arroyo Grande, Calif. The Christian Herald has always believed and holds today that the Bible is inspired from cover to cover. Those who find out some passages and doubt their authenticity, get into the realm of higher criticism and then the Bible goes by the board. The Bible is God's revelation to men.

M. M. S., Allentown, Pa. One may not know that he has prayed amiss until his prayer is unanswered, and he becomes convinced that what he prays for is not to be prayed for. But that is no argument against insistence in prayer. Your Heavenly Father invites you to bring all your troubles before him. He wants his children to feel that he is interested in all of their affairs. He answers our prayers, not always in the way we would wish them answered, it is true; but consistent seekers at the door of Mercy and Hope can ever find help in their communion with Him "from whom cometh all good." 2. If you have asked forgiveness and done all in your power to make amends for a wrong committed, you have done enough. If he whom you have wronged persists in carrying a grudge, that is his failure, not yours. Seventy times seven was the Master's injunction for our forgiveness of wrongs, and he who does not follow it is not His true disciple.

O. E. V., Newark, Ill. No one ever has a right to claim that this or that theology, either ancient or modern, could or would save sinners. Theology is the science of teaching how to bring the message, but the message itself is the thing and the only means of salvation—the message of the Cross and a dying Saviour. Do not let us at this time criticize or prefer one form of religion before another. God is served in many ways. Let us leave all to him.

G. A. E., Mankata, Sask., Canada, and H. R., Littles, Canada. 1. The Gospel account of the Transfiguration says that Moses and Elias were conversing with Jesus. Since John, James and Peter were also there, under spiritual exaltation, they may have joined in the conversation. There is a report of what Peter suggested. Therefore Peter must either have been told that Moses and Elias were there, or he had divined it. 2. In the parable of Dives and Lazarus, Christ is making use of the Jewish tradition according to which Paradise and Gehenna are so situated that one is visible from the other. The recognition of Abraham points to the fact that descent from Abraham, even when acknowledged in that state after death, and recognizing the patriarch and calling on him for help, is in itself of no avail.

H. R. B., Springfield, Mass. We have often stated that no one who is afraid and troubled by the fear that he has committed the unpardonable sin has really done so, for to have committed it would mean that the Spirit of God had left him, and one in that condition would not care whether he had committed the sin or not. But your troubled conscience shows that the Spirit is still working in you. So long as you trust God, he will not forsake you and will yet bring you to that peace which passeth all understanding.

Ralph P. Weed, Worcester, Mass. "I read with great pleasure the article in your paper of July 17, 1918, 'Safeguarding Our Army's Food Supply,' by Edward Mott Woolley. I agree with you that the work is worthy of the nation, but the pay paid these honest, faithful and loyal men is a disgrace. Many of them are paid less than the United Charities appropriate for a pauper's family in the stockyard district of Chicago. The packers have increased the pay of their employees nearly 100 per cent. since the war began, and reduced their hours from ten to eight, until the men working for the packers are receiving more money for less hours of service than the inspectors who supervise the work. Congress has appropriated $10 per month for the inspectors, and that is the only increase many of them have received in seven or eight years. I am enclosing a clipping from the Weekly News Letter of June 12, published by the Department of Agriculture. I have checked the item of 1,312 men and 55 women who have been starved out and forced to leave the service to obtain a living wage. This is very nearly 50 per cent. of the working force outside of Washington, D. C., and the positions have been filled to a great extent by temporary appointments who have never passed any civil service examination to determine their fitness. The reason is that men will not take the examination for the salary paid. I see the Department of Commerce and Labor reports $1,650 per annum necessary for a family of five to live on in comfort. And I am sure these men, who many times work twelve and fourteen hours per day with no pay for overtime, are worthy of a living wage. If you wish to become familiar with their struggles for better pay, read the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, on H. R. 5972: a Bill relating to certain employees of the Bureau of Animal Industry; also remarks by Hon. William Wilson, House of Representatives, December 19, 1916."

E. N. O., Carville, La., and A. A. L., Omaha, Neb. 1. Was it Samuel in person, or a spiritual being in his image, that appeared before the woman and spoke to Saul; or was it an evil spirit? 2. Was the communication recorded in Sam. 28: 15-19 directly spoken by Samuel to Saul?

Saul was a king of violent temper, moody and given to melancholy. Estranged in his friendships and at odds with his advisers, he sought the aid of this woman, who had the reputation of being able to communicate with the spirits of the dead. Much has been written on the question whether, in the scene at Endor, there was an imposture or a real apparition. Eustathius and a majority of the early Christian fathers held the former opinion, and represent it as a deception of the evil one; Origen held the latter view. It should be remembered that Saul, at the time, was forsaken of God and, rendered desperate by his sins, he had recourse to this woman, who in the Hebrew writings is described as "a mistress of Ob" or a necromancer (not a "witch") who obtained a living by pretending to have intercourse with spirits, while the Greek writers describe her as a ventriloquist. Josephus, the Jewish historian, describes her as one of a class of fortune-tellers who had been banished by the king. Saul's highly wrought nervous condition at the time, combined with the fact that he himself saw no vision or spirit, but simply listened to and accepted the necromancer's description of an aged man of god-like appearance, should be taken into consideration. These facts doubtless influenced the early fathers in reaching the conclusion that the wretched king had been the victim of an imposture.

Guy O. Carpenter, chaplain, U. S. N. Training Station, San Francisco, writes in appreciation of the copies of the Christian Herald sent to the station every week. He adds: "They are a great help in my work and are greatly appreciated by the men. Never since I have been here have I had a copy left, and never have I seen a copy thrown away on the parade ground. Almost every Sunday the men beg me for more copies than I have, so that I have a time saving enough to take to the sick men in the hospital. It is just the magazine the men need and like, as it is vitally Christian and yet un denominational; it is current and yet clean and wholesome."

Private Thomas F. Hickey, Fort Crockett, Texas, writes: "I am a United States Marine of 104th Co., 8th Regiment, at Fort Crockett, Galveston, Texas. I wish to thank the Christian Herald very much for sending me the beautiful copies I have been receiving for the past seven months. It is through the Y. M. C. A. that gave me notice of it. It has very nice stories, and it is a pleasure to read it, and when I am through with it I give it to some other men in my company. They all like it very much."

We are glad to know that our friends in the Marines, as well as in the other branches of the service, all welcome the Christian Herald. We only wish we could send a copy to every one in the service.

M. H. R., Chicago, Ill. The following quotation is taken from a letter to me from my brother, a major in the Medical Reserve now in France: "The fields are covered with poppies; the larks sing as I have never heard birds sing; and although the war is real and terrible, there is something about being in it and a part of this great struggle for the right that gives one a great thankfulness." I read this letter to a friend and this sentence reminded her of a sermon in the Christian Herald of April 10, which she lent me. It was entitled "Over the Top with the Stars of God," by Rev. Edwin Kelgwin, D.D.—a wonderfully inspiring sermon which has crystallized vague ideas that were in my mind but that I could not express. I would like to have others read it. If it were published in tract or pamphlet form it could be sent to the boys "over there," helping them to feel that they are "co-laborers with God" in this war for righteousness. Surely the germ of this thought is in their hearts, and reading the sermon would bring it to maturity and give them an added inspiration and consecration. The thought of God's Service Star at Bethlehem must have come to many. Last December, Emma Conger Thomson, my cousin in Orange, California, was thinking of her son in the service and saw a beautiful star from her window as she gazed into the sky. She wrote these verses:

"When our Heavenly Father sent his Son
To serve in lands afar,
He hung in the skies of Bethlehem,
A sacred Service Star.
And as our son goes forth to serve,
We hope that naught will mar
The soul of him for whom God hung
A sacred service star."

F. R., Germantown, Pa. The time when the world will see the last of the kings may yet be far off. Your idea of a republic of Middle Europe, however, may some day be realized. No one can foresee the changes that may take place after the war. It has pulled down several crowns already, and others may fall before all is over. "A Free World for Free Peoples" is a noble sentiment. May it be prophetic.

Marion Harland's Corner

Once Again "In the Bread Line"

IF personal experience and the reiterated warnings and admonitions of government officials and the public prints had not ground into my memory the imminent importance of the wheat bread question, our corner correspondence would keep it continually before me. I offer but a few examples of this:

As to the question regarding dry yeast, I would say that I have used this for several years with satisfactory results.

I use it as the compressed yeast is used, by soaking in a little warm water until it is thoroughly softened, then mixing with other ingredients. The advantages are that it costs less and does not spoil easily. It will keep indefinitely, but the fresh cakes are more active and the bread will rise more quickly.

I think it is rather more reliable when all or part milk is used, instead of all water.—Mrs. J. N. R. (New Hampshire).

Yeast is an indispensable accessory to the manufacture of the family loaf. Neither muffins nor quickly made cakes of divers sorts take its place. Another bread-maker has a word respecting the dry yeast to the merits of which others have attested:

For a while I clung to the brand of yeast used by my mother and my neighbors. Then a friend in whom I have much confidence told me of her experience with the dry cakes. She said they are more uniform in quality than anything else she had ever tried, and keep longer without losing strength. For six months I have used no other in my baking, and can conscientiously endorse her opinion.—Mrs. V. C. M. (New Jersey).

I enclose several recipes which I know by experience are good. The first you would all

Old-Fashioned Brown Bread

One cupful bread-crumbs; one cupful cornmeal; one cupful graham flour; one and one-half cupful sweet or sour milk; one cupful New Orleans molasses; one half-teaspoonful soda; one-half teaspoonful salt; and one teaspoonful of shortening. Steam two hours. Bake half an hour. I use coffee or baking powder cans.—ELIZA M. D. (Illinois).

With the disagreeable memory of an omission in another recipe for wheatless bread, a while ago, I venture to suggest that a full teaspoonful of soda would be required to bring into effervescence all the acid in molasses and sour milk called for here as the "raising" agent in your formula. Where no yeast is used the combination of acid and alkali that causes fermentation in the dough should be justly calculated. A too common fault with cooks is to have "too heavy a hand" with soda, and likewise with baking-powders. Nevertheless, the proper balance should be preserved. The other recipes for which we have to thank you will appear as we can make room for them in our small Corner.

Can you give me a reliable recipe for making yeast bread with substitutes, either with or without wheat flour? I have tried many recipes with no success, until I feel that I can waste no more material. I use compressed yeast, but my bread rises very slowly, and falls like cake that is too rich.—ELLA G. L. (New York).

It is one of the pleasant coincidences that star all lives, if we keep a bright lookout for them, that the mail which brought your request contained what may be accepted as a direct reply:

Perhaps my method of making "Victory Bread" may help some one. The yeast-bread is more successful and economical than the quick breads with me. I always use the dry yeast cakes. I also prefer a large bowl and heavy iron spoon to a bread-mixer; I can then judge better of the stiffness of the dough.

In the evening, start a sponge by mixing one cup of warm potato-water, one cup of mashed potatoes, one teaspoonful of salt, one tablespoonful of sugar and one yeast cake soaked in water.

Next morning, place in the bowl three cups of rolled oats—or part corn meal instead—one heaping tablespoonful of lard, three tablespoonfuls of sugar, three tablespoonfuls of molasses; two heaping teaspoonfuls of salt. Pour over this five cups of boiling water, stir, and let it cook, stirring occasionally. Add sponge and flour to make a thick batter. When light add flour to make a stiff dough; then with spoon and knife, place in tins. When light bake in a moderate oven an hour or a little more. I use any kind of mixed flour I have on hand, as it is better than any one kind of "substitute." Mashed potato added to the sponge or batter improves it. This makes four loaves.—Mrs. C. H. (New York).

Thousands of Americans do not consider warm bread as wholesome as cold. They want a loaf that will slice smoothly; that may be made into sandwiches without crumbling; that will cut evenly for the toast that figures prominently upon our breakfast tables; as several members have said, they want unsweetened bread! In my own family, where the law of wheatless days has been observed for a year, we find nothing that takes the place of the wheat loaf—available alike for toast, sandwiches, crumbs for puddings and for breading chops, as well as a certain oaten bread which we get from the manufacturers. I wish it were practicable to imitate it successfully in private kitchens! Any attempt in this direction would be gratefully hailed by seventy per cent. of readers and judges of nourishing and palatable fare.

A correspondent asked lately for a recipe for "old-fashioned buckwheat johnny cake." It gives me pleasure to be able to answer the request:

Buckwheat Johnny-Cakes

This is the way I make them with water. Of course the farmer's wife will know what to do when she has plenty of buttermilk and milk, but this is for the city wife. Cover one-half a yeast-cake in the evening with warm water—say one pint. Mix buckwheat and a little wheat flour in; stir for five minutes; add one teaspoon sugar; set in a warm place to rise. Next morning put in one egg, salt, and enough water, more buckwheat flour, and some corn flour to make a good batter. Leave some dough each time for the next day out of this. In the evening it is best to put warm water and flour in again, cover, and so on. If this don't rise enough add one-half a yeast cake, but leave some of the old dough for the next day, always.—Mrs. J. C. (Nebraska).

Farmers' wives old enough to recollect the winter breakfasts of "buckwheat johnnies and molasses" will applaud the loyalty of our Nebraska member to the days of her childhood. "Nothing tastes now as it did then," is a lament of which we grow weary sometimes, in view of the confessed improvements in the national culinary department. All the same, we cling to the fond memory of the good things that "mother used to make."

Heaven grant that we may always thus cling and dream!

My daughter, who is my housekeeper, says: "Tell her we find that cold corn bread and muffins make delicious stuffing for roast chicken—if one is so lucky as to have chicken."

It sounds like "If I had some ham I'd have some ham and eggs if I had some eggs!" A friend told us the other day that she had looked through all her cook-books and found not one recipe for plain corn meal mush. I remembered having the same experience years ago, and finding one later which I had to modify. Some day will you give one, and also state if you think that wetting the meal before stirring it into the boiling water affects the flavor? It is claimed that only the old way of sprinkling the meal into the boiling water will do, and a careless cook will get it very lumpy.—Mrs. D. J. B. (New Jersey).

Here is the simplest and best recipe for plain boiled mush I have. I do not think that wetting the meal with cold water before cooking affects the flavor. Nor have I ever seen why the olden style of sprinkling the meal by handfuls into the boiling pot is of advantage to the consistency or the taste of the mush. On the contrary, each handful is disposed to lump because the outside cooks more rapidly than the inside, and forms a coating about the raw meal.

Your friend is unlucky in her assortment of cook-books. The following is taken verbatim from the first I opened:

Indian Meal Mush

Moisten a cupful of corn meal with enough cold water to make it into a paste. Stir this paste gradually into a quart of salted boiling water and cook, beating it up hard and often, for at least one hour. Should the mush become too stiff, add from time to time more boiling water.

"Did you put in Grape-Nuts, Harry?"
 "Yes, sir."
 "Plenty of it?"
 "I think so, sir. I remember your saying how compact and nourishing it is, and that a small quantity is worth more than a great amount of some bulky foods."

American Red Cross Home Service

By ALEXANDER M. WILSON

Director Civilian Relief, Atlantic Division, American Red Cross

HOW the American Red Cross through its Home Service work is helping to bind the different races of America into one unified nation was recently described at various meetings in Washington attended by Red Cross Division Directors of Civilian
Relief from all over the United States.
The Mexicans, who constitute a great problem in the Southwest, the Indians of several Western divisions, the foreign populations of the Atlantic seaboard cities, the negroes of the South, and even, in one remote part of Minnesota, a group of Icelandic people, are all coming under the attention of Home Service because they are sending sons and fathers away to war, and any family that has a soldier or a sailor at the front or in training has a claim upon the government.

A message of neighborliness and social sympathy is being carried into remote districts which never before took the trouble to recognize their social problems and make headway against them by proper methods. The men and women who have been directing this organizing work, Division Directors of Civilian Relief, met at the call of W. Frank Persons, Director General, to perfect and extend the plans which have already resulted in the formation of over 3,000 chapters, which already have been helping over 200,000 families of men in service.

In the south the Home Service workers are in many cases dealing with negroes who have more money than they ever had before. Government allowances are wealth to them, and they are being educated in habits of thrift that will make war time the beginning of lasting prosperity. In the Southwest among the Mexicans a spirit of brotherhood and a message of common humanity is being carried by Home Service workers. Little isolated communities all over the country are being made to feel that they are a part of the great United States, a part of the national program.

Problems of the conference centered chiefly about the question of morale, the difficult side of winning the war which the Home Service organization has taken as one of its chief responsibilities. One of the greatest influences upon the fighting capacity of the men in the trenches comes from their thoughts about home.
If cheerful thoughts are supported by frequent and cheerful letters, and by the assurance that if anything happens at home requiring outside help the Home Service workers are ready and anxious to be of service, then the men will fight with greater enthusiasm and persistence and will not be so susceptible to shell shock or depression of spirits.

A manual prepared by C. E. Lakeman of the Headquarters Staff of Civilian Relief brought up the questions of after-care which are of particular concern to Home Service workers. The support of the family is counted on by all the agencies interested in the welfare of the partially disabled men who are to be expected when greater numbers of American troops get into action. It is the belief of the army surgeons here, based upon the experience of other countries, that nearly every wounded man may be fitted to take a useful place in the industrial or business world in spite of the loss of a limb, or even of his eyesight. They fear more than anything else that returned disabled soldiers will be weakened in their resolution to retain their self-respect and find real work by the mistaken kindness of hero worshipers, who will eventually make such men little better off than beggars. They will sustain them on charity until the men have passed the period in which they might be learning a useful occupation, and then will forget them when the first flush of war enthusiasm is over.

The Smith-Sears law appropriated a fund to re-educate every disabled soldier who would take the opportunity. Under the law there will be no compulsion in the matter of education, but every means will be taken to encourage the soldier to learn a trade or an occupation which will enable him to take his place and make his way as well as if he had never been wounded. It is here that the influence of the family will be one of the most potent factors, and the Home Service sections have been in touch almost from the beginning with the soldiers' families.

It is to make this organization complete in every village and crossroads as well as in New York or Boston that the directors are devoting themselves. The Information Service is a bureau which receives every day from all over the country hundreds of letters sent in by Home Service Sections asking help in straightening out financial troubles into which soldiers' families have fallen through the failure of their allotments or allowances to reach them. The mistakes which the families themselves make in filling out blanks, the mistakes which soldiers make, and the misunderstandings that arise by accident—these things, added to the great complexity of the task which the War Risk Insurance Bureau is accomplishing, make a great many difficulties. Home Service workers believe that they have many more things to do for the soldier's family than merely to see that they have money until the allowance comes. But they see that these material things are taken care of first. As one director said, "We are not setting up merely an information service; that is usually no more than our first point of contact; and we are most emphatically not running charity bureaus. But along with the other kind things that we want every soldier's family to feel that the Red Cross stands ready to do for them is to see that they are not in need of money when things unexpectedly go wrong."

The most striking need at the present moment is for more trained workers and volunteers who will take the six weeks' Institute courses that are offered in the larger cities. These institutes are brief but thorough courses in social service.
"The ideally organized community," said C. E. Stillman, associate director in the Chicago office, "would be a community where every class of people is represented on the Home Service committee, where there are as many men as women willing to do visiting and give friendly and sympathetic advice, and where the work is centralized under the direction of a trained secretary who gives all her time to the work and keeps an office to which any one can go."

It is to secure these trained secretaries that attendance at the Institutes is most needed. Under the general direction of Porter R. Lee of New York and Dr. Thomas J. Riley of Brooklyn, both well known in the field of education for social work, much has been done, but the sessions of the Institutes will be multiplied to accommodate the increasing number of volunteers who wish to take part in the work. To accomplish this, the courses and methods of some of the schools will be adapted to the needs of smaller communities, and will be held in the less thickly populated districts. This will enable workers to get in touch with the rural and small town problems as well as city problems, and will broaden the scope of the teaching.

One Big Drive

FOLLOWING protests against the proposed grouping in two main divisions of the appeals for support of the various organizations ministering to the spiritual comfort and moral and physical well-being of our boys "Over There," the whole matter was referred to President Wilson; and it was announced on September 4 that all funds would be grouped in one great canvass to begin November 11 and to continue for one week. The American people will be asked to give a total of $170,- 500,000, of which the Y. M. C. A. will expend $100,000,000 and the Y. W. C.
A. and War Camp Community Service
$15,000,000 each. The Salvation Army

What It Means to Be a Christian

International Sunday School Lesson for September 29
I John 3:1-24

A Review Lesson

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

OUR course of study in the Christian Life ends with today's lesson and once more we look back to review a quarter's work in our Sunday school careers. As we go quickly over the ground covered by the past twelve topics, we realize more completely the purpose back of the selection of the Bible readings we have had placed before us. There has been a plan in it all, and now we have a chance to see it and to refresh our minds and correlate our teachings. Teachers should always make an outline of their subjects before they begin, and I have found it invaluable to make another independent of the first after completing the work. It is very instructive to compare the two. Get your class to help you to make a blackboard summary of the quarter. Here is a suggestion:

The Christian Life

1. Enlistment—The Life Begun.
2. The Bible—Its Principles.
3. Prayer—Its Direction.
4. Obedience—Its Spirit.
5. Growth—Its Development.
6. Good Deeds—Its Exercise and Method. (Five Special Avenues)
7. Church Work.
8. Evangelism.
9. Christian Giving.
10. Fighting Evil.
11. World Missions.
12. The Rewards of Service.

Christianity According to St. John

Having reviewed our work in such clear-cut present-day terms full of meaning even to the youngest among us, we can turn now to the beautiful letter which is our special study today, wherein "the disciple whom Jesus loved" gives us his interpretation of the life which we now live by faith in the Son of God. This letter is in full accord with John's Gospel, but is even plainer and simpler in stating "what it means to be a Christian," and is written with a winsome tenderness that is much more successful than labored argument could ever be. Never were the Christian graces made more attractive, and never was sin, unbelief and hypocrisy more sternly denounced by a pen whose sweetness never became feebleness.

A Present Redemption and a Glorious Prospect "Beloved, now are we children of God." The Christian experience is not to be described in terms of mere probation for future bliss and communion. We enter upon our heritage in this present world, being delivered from fear and loneliness as well as sin, and entering here and now into a large measure of communion with our Heavenly Father. Have not all the great saints testified to this? Listen to Simon Patrick praying, "Oh, how marvelous is thy love in Christ! How many tokens and pledges have I received of thy grace! and what treasures of joy do I find in thy great and precious promises! I can do no less than make an oblation of myself, with a heart full of love and thankfulness to thee for the benefits thou hast already bestowed upon me."

To St. John this present joy was heightened by a lively expectation of a more wondrous future. Even he could not put it into words, saying only in general, that when Christ shall appear we shall "be like him." What a halloing thought! Truly, "every one that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as He is pure." Perhaps we of this generation need to be re-awakened to the mystical side of our religion, while in no wise forsaking our very practical manifestations of Christianity in a life of service. We are losing inspiration and joy. Richard Baxter says: "If I should tell a worldling what the holiness and spiritual joys of the saints on earth are, he can not know; for grace can not be clearly known without grace; how much less could he conceive it, should I tell him of this (future) glory! But to the saints I may be somewhat more encouraged to speak."

This is today a neglected aspect of the Christian life, partly because we are so practically minded.

There was no one more abundant in good works than Richard Baxter, yet he drew his strength from "The Saints' Everlasting Rest." He believed in prayerful Bible reading, in meditative communion. Says he, "Run familiarly through the streets of the heavenly Jerusalem; visit the patriarchs and the prophets, salute the apostles, and admire the armies of martyrs; lead on thy heart from street to street, bring it into the palace of the Great King." And in another place he makes this note upon a verse of the Gospel of John: "Oh, the full joys offered to a believer in that sentence of Christ: 'Father, I will that they whom thou hast given me be with me where I am, that they may behold the glory which thou hast given me!'"

Righteousness and a Brotherly Love

It is remarkable how men of such different points of view as John and James and Paul agree on the fundamentals. For example, this chapter presents two great key words for the Christian character: righteousness and brotherly love. What are these but the abstract term used by the first Christian philosopher for the concrete illustrations used by the first Christian moralist whose definition of religion is "To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world?"

Nor was John's conception of righteousness a merely formal one. He meant by it real, honest, downright Christian goodness of heart and life. It is no academic and forensic righteousness such as some of the theologians have made it. If the Gospel were not producing clean, strong men and women living right lives before the world it would be a failure. "By their fruits shall ye know them."

Neither is the Christian's righteousness a cold and impersonal thing, however correct. Brotherliness is its essence; it glows through and through with loving interest in one's fellows, with sympathy and the desire to help. Could St. James have put it any stronger than this: "Whoso hath the world's goods and beholdeth his brother in need, and shutteth up his compassion from him, how doth the love of God abide in him?"

What does it mean to be a Christian? In briefest terms it means to have the spirit of Christ. According to John it is the Spirit of Christ abiding in a man that makes him God's and gives him the supreme assurance that only comes from fellowship. Paul says plainly in his mighty chapter on the Christian life (Romans 8): "If any man hath not the spirit of Christ he is none of his." Do we display a Christ-like spirit? Do we in our contact with the world and in our fellowship with our brethren and sisters in the church? One of the most caustic comments ever passed upon a professed Christian minister was quietly made in these simple but final words, "He does not remind me of Jesus Christ."

What Jesus Expects of Us

Jesus is not only the Divine Lord, but he is also the Great Energizer. It was he who made those simple Galileans great. Is it unreasonable for us to believe that his expectations concerning us are high? Cultured, fortunate, young Americans, trained in splendid public schools and consecrated churches, "ye are the light of the world, ye are the salt of the earth" not less than the little company who sat at His feet on the mountain side two thousand years ago. Are you going to disappoint him? Or are you going to make today a fuller consecration than you have ever made before? "A new commandment write I unto you, because the darkness is passing away, and the true light already shineth." "Walk in the light as He is in the light."

WE were talking ambitions. "I," said the business man, quite emphatically, "want to make money. I want to make a great deal of money, and I want to make it as quickly as I can. I suppose you all think that I am thoroughly commercialized, and—well, perhaps I am! But I reckon most everybody's out, more or less, after money."

The little poetess raised great reproachful eyes to the business man. "I'm not out after money," she told him. "Of course, I want to sell my verses—if I can—but that's not the main thing. I want my verses to be splendid—to have people say, long after I'm gone, that I was a great —" the little poetess paused.

"Genius?" suggested some one, finishing her sentence for her.

The little poetess blushed. But, "Well, perhaps!" she admitted quite honestly.

"I would like"—it was the youngest boy who spoke, the boy who was just out of knickers and very conscious of the fact—"I would like to be an adventurer! I would like to travel just—lots! I would like to be sort of a captain on a pirate ship, or I'd like to be a whaler, or find a hidden city, or a gold mine, or just hunt tigers in India, or lions in Africa, or rough it in Alaska. I'd like to do something different from—"

"Studying?" questioned the business man, who was his father, "I reckon you would. Your last report was pretty bad. That Latin mark—" He shook his head regretfully and the youngest boy blushed and stopped talking. And we laughed. But our laughter was the understanding sort of laughter.

I looked across at the successful author. He was listening, his charming boyish face quite serious.

"It's all copy to you," I told him under cover of the general laughter. "You're thinking how silly we are—we and our pet ambitions!"

The successful author glanced at me quizzically.

"I was wondering about your ambition," he told me—"You haven't said—"

"Neither have you," I interrupted—"neither have you! Maybe—" I hesitated—"maybe your ambition is quite realized. You're a big man in this writing game, you've made a name, you've arrived—maybe there isn't much more for you to want!"

The successful author smiled at me. "Somehow," he said slowly, "my ambition has never had vitally much to do with my writing. My ambition is such an indefinite one that you'd hardly, I suppose, call it an ambition. I just want to go along doing the best work that's in me, living my life day by day, knowing friendship, and love, and laughter! I want to have clean ideals, and I want to live up to them, so that when I come to the end of the road I can look myself in the eyes and say, 'I'm not ashamed!' That's my ambition."

I looked around the room—silently, thoughtfully. The youngest boy was studying a particularly mean variety of Latin prose, but I saw a book with a very un-Latin prose cover sticking out of his pocket. Two young people, quite obviously in love, were engrossed in conversation. They had not even heard our talk of ambitions. The business man and the little poetess were arguing, and the little poetess was showing signs that spoke of annoyance. I looked around the room slowly and thoughtfully, and then I looked back at the successful author.

"After all," I said, "ambition is a different thing to everybody! To youth it's adventure. To a certain type of mind it's fame, and to another type of mind it's wealth. The two in that corner"—I pointed toward the pair who were quite obviously in love—"think that it's—well, we'll call it romance. To me—to me it's not very far away from the sort of ambition you have. I, too, want to live happily and helpfully. I, too, at the end of the road, want to be able to say, as I look into my heart, that I'm not ashamed."

AMBITION, adventure, romance, wealth, and fame! Ambition—the winding forest path that leads through so many tangles of underbrush, through such thickets and marshes and up such steep hills! Ambition—the wraith that so many people follow only to find that it is a wraith. Ambition, the lodestar that such multitudes set their course by!

Everybody in the world, I think, has some sort of an ambition. It may not be noble and worth while—it may even be a low ambition, an ambition to do unkind things. But there is, in every human heart, some spark of that eternal fire that spurs one to do—something.

To the youngest boy it was cruising in a pirate bark or hunting a buried treasure. To the business man it was gold. To the little poetess it was fame. But, somehow, the successful author, who said that his ambition was scarcely an ambition at all, had caught the keynote of every real ambition. And I'm sure that, if the youngest boy and the business man and the little poetess had heard him, they would have agreed that, underneath any minor ambition that spoke of wealth or adventure or fame, he had caught the great idea.

Every one who loves God and appreciates the beautiful world that he has given us to live in should have one ambition—one great ambition—under everything. And that ambition should be the desire to walk along life's road in a worthwhile way, so that, when the end of the road comes, one can look himself in the face and say:

"I may not have made a great record. I may not have gained wealth, I may be just one grain of sand on an eternal seashore, but I can meet my Maker with clean hands, and I can look myself in the eyes without shame—and that's the Big Thing."

What One Brave Woman Did

MANY people in many lands will mourn the loss of Miss Mary Hart, who died on August 1, at 90 Plymouth Avenue, Rochester, N. Y. She founded the missionary organization known throughout the world as the Little Helpers' Society (which is now in every Episcopal Diocese) at Rochester, twenty-six years ago. The Little Helpers' Society had as its first charter member Miss Hart's little nephew, Gaylord Hart Mitchell. It soon spread in the United States, and now has branches in England, Africa, China and other countries. In honor of Miss Hart a Kindergarten was started in Akita, Japan, and from this twenty-one more soon were organized in that country.

On the day before she passed away Rev. Charles H. Evans wrote from Japan: "We hallowed the new kindergarten at Odate by a communion service and have named it the 'Hart Memorial'. Thus we commemorate your own loving and long-continued efforts on behalf of Christ's little ones throughout the world, and the memory of your dear brother." The Odate Kindergarten, the twenty-fourth founded by the Little Helpers, is itself a lasting memorial to one whose enthusiasm for mission work has spread the branches of that influential organization through every diocese at home and abroad.

Bishop John McKim spoke of the society as "one of the most beneficent and successful of evangelistic agencies," adding: "I want one in every field." So far as Japan is concerned his wish is rapidly being fulfilled, for the $1,000 for the last Kindergarten in Odate was obtained through the instrumentality of Miss Hart, who wrote letters from her sick-room soliciting subscriptions almost to the last day of her life. It is noteworthy, too, that this sum began with a consecrated twenty-five cent piece which she had taken to a meeting of the denominational organization in Buffalo.

Baptist Strength and Weakness in Our State

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Acts 1:8

WHATEVER may be the strength or weakness of the Baptist organization in your state, a better text could not have been chosen upon which to organize for victory. "Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost has come upon you and ye shall be witnesses unto me." The spirit-filled witnessing church is always a power. Whatever may be the strength of the church in your state in buildings, in men and women, its true power is measured by the degree to which these men and women have been baptized with the Holy Spirit and by the voice of their witnessing. Whatever may be your numbers, your weakness may lie in the large number who have neither sought nor received the Holy Ghost, whose faith is largely but an intellectual assent to the doctrines and practices of the church and whose witnessing is meager in volume and weak in assurance. It is not enough that we declare our faith by participating in the sacraments of the Church; we must declare it by word of mouth at every opportunity, or at least at every challenge, and we must declare it hour by hour in our daily living and in our conduct before the world. Leaders chosen for this meeting will be able to secure statistics of numbers and benevolence from the secretary of the Convention of their state whose name and address can be easily procured from the pastor.

The Saloon Power and How to Overthrow It

Epworth League Topic. Heb. 2:1-17

THIS topic was used as the Christian Endeavor Topic for September 15, and was treated in the Christian Herald of September 4, on page 1014.

Lessons from Favored Hymns

Christian Endeavor Topic. Acts 16:22-25; 11 Chron. 5:11-14

PAUL and Silas singing in prison witnessed so powerfully for their faith that the jailer, after the earthquake, sought from them how he might be saved. The Levites singing the Psalm of Israel paved the way for the glory of the Lord to encompass the House of God. Jewish faith was many times upborne upon the wings of the Psalms and those great songs of Israel are still a fair haven and a certain refuge for stricken and weary hearts, and a sure foundation for that courage that knows no defeat. Through the long centuries the church has been singing the Psalms and in the years since Christ gave his Great Commission, the spirit has moved men, gifted with far-seeing faith and blessed by grace, to express in song those hopes and aspirations which are universal with the race of men. Cardinal Newman's "Lead, Kindly Light" is a beacon of assurance to every heart burdened with doubt and anxious to believe. Charles Wesley's "Jesus, Lover of My Soul" has brought comfort and consolation to multiplied thousands. No hymnbook can be complete without both. Similarly "Rock of Ages" bears its witness to God's mercy. "A Mighty Fortress," "Safely Through Another Week," "Break Thou the Bread of Life," "Onward Christian Soldiers," "Work for the Night is Coming," and in these later days the hymns of Fannie Crosby, of P. P. Bliss and even more recently "Brighten the Corner," have claimed our hearts and strengthened our spirits as we sang together their familiar meter. There is a thing which psychologists call mass consciousness. People singing together the same song achieve involuntarily a common feeling, as their voices blend, their hearts and minds unite and from the singing comes renewed patriotism and strength for mighty armies to do battle for the nation and for God. The song of faith puts many an uncertain foot upon the pathway of our Lord. The song of hope brightens the dark corners of doubt until the light of assurance is able to dispel the darkness. The song of cheer drives gloom from the heart and leaves a smile and a new light in the eye. Shakespeare put no faith in a man who had no music in his soul. Language is the speech of the mind. Music is the language of the heart and by its music a nation is known and by its singing the Young People's Society is often identified.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

A FEW weeks ago, when German blows were forcing back the Allied armies, waiting the time to strike, America prayed. As though in answer to our prayer and in accordance with his plan and purpose, God now gives us victory. Shall we not pray again, daily, for the triumph of right over might, of righteousness over frightfulness, and for our boys, that they may be kept true hearted through all the swelter and hell of battle, that they may be victors in life as well as in combat, as firm in faith as in attack?

Mrs. M. H. E. prays to forget great wrongs that have been done her, the memory of which she fears may ruin her Christian life. She also asks prayer for the conversion of a young man whose immoral life and abusive conduct threaten to break up his family.

Mrs. F. E. S. asks prayers for her son and his family, all of whom have been converted, but whom she is following with a mother's love and care. She also acknowledges many answers to prayer, and asks more prayers for herself and a daughter who is still unsaved.

Two hundred and seven ask prayer for healing of friends or relatives; including Mrs. E. A. R., that sister may be healed without an operation; A Friend, that a certain soldier who has been wounded may be healed and return home safe; Miss S. R. P., for the recovery from cancer of the wife of a Christian worker; J. M., that Evangelist Billy Sunday may be restored to health, thirty-three friends, for healing of self, including Mrs. C. C., to recover entirely from an operation and be made fit to care for family; E. M., to have the use of my limbs restored.

Thirty-one parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; nine wives, their husbands, fifty other relatives and friends.

Fifty-one friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

J. R. E. asks prayer that son may be fully cured of the drug habit.

Forty-six friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Twelve friends ask prayer for special blessing for others. Including Miss M. H., that two loved ones may return safely from somewhere in France; M. H. K., that son may be blessed who is in a trainlug camp; two friends, that their sons may return safely home after the war.

Twenty-four friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for themselves, relatives or friends.

One hundred and five friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs, including A Reader, Ill., for a good rain to save the crop; E. S., for a sure peace.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

Mrs. W. M. W., Hopkinton, Iowa; J. M. P., Buchanan, Mich.; Sister, Leedsdale, Pa.; Mrs. H. E. S., Portland, Me.; Mrs. J. W. D., Venice, Calif.; Mrs. H. H., Wayne, Me.; Mrs. A. M., Rolette, N. D.; Mrs. A. E. C., Running Water, Texas; Mrs. C. A. L., Zephyr, Texas; Mrs. F. F., Stauton, Mich.; Miss S. J. G., Inavale, Neb.; Mrs. C. E. W., Protection, Kan.; Mrs. C. H., Lake Odessa, Mich.; E. M. P., South Leeds, Me.; A. T. E., Pelican Rapids, Minn.

The saloon men are on the run—they would fly but for the fact that their business has not been conducive to growth of wings.

What Your Liberty Bond Will Do

IF you buy a $100 bond of the Fourth Liberty Loan you are lending the United States Government enough money to feed a soldier in France a little more than seven months. Or you have furnished enough money to give him a complete outfit of winter and summer clothing, including shoes and stockings, and slicker, and overcoat and blankets, with enough left over to arm him with a good revolver. You have done that much to beat back the Hun.

It takes $35 more to arm him with a rifle with a bayonet on it, and if you buy a second $100 bond you furnish him this rifle and 1,000 cartridges for it; and there will still be enough of your money left to purchase a good-sized bomb to throw in a dugout, or demolish a machine-gun together with the Huns operating it.

"Losing Sight of the Cross"

I HAVE read with much interest the article in the Editorial Forum of the Christian Herald, on this subject. I have studied the present condition of the church and the remedy, and it seems to me that the editorial does not go to the root of the trouble. That is clearly stated, and the remedy suggested in 1 Tim. 1:5, 6 (I quote from the Twentieth Century New Testament, because that makes the meaning so clear), "The object of all instruction is to call forth that love which comes from a pure heart, a clear conscience and a sincere faith; and it is because they have not aimed at these things that the attention of some people has been diverted to unprofitable subjects."

Of course, the only way to "call forth that love which comes from a pure heart, a clear conscience, and a sincere faith," is to proclaim the good news of the love of God, and to deliver the message of His love which He sent to mankind through His Son, Jesus Christ. For if we ever truly love, it is because "we have learnt to know and have accepted as a fact the love that God has for us" (1 John 4:16); for "we love because God first loved us" (1 John 3:19).

We have the certainty of God's love for us in the fact that, first of all, and above everything else, He asks us to love Him and one another (Matt. 22:34-40). We have the measure of God's love in His having so loved the world that He gave His Son to redeem it. "God puts His love for us beyond all doubt by the fact that Christ died on our behalf, while we were still sinners."

All of the causes of weakness in the church, mentioned by Dr. Horton, are clearly the result of lack of love. "Lack of unity" certainly is. The only way that Jesus tells us that we can be recognized as His disciples is by loving one another (John 13:35). This is the only way by which we may have witness to His saving and purifying power. Jesus prayed that his followers might all be one, "that the world may believe that Thou hast sent me as Thy messenger," and "that they may be perfected in their union, that the world may know that Thou hast sent me" (John 17:20-24). The obstacles that prevent the unity of believers are the results of unprofitable teaching, and "love out of a pure heart" will remove them all.

Excessive "formulary rites and practices" are things substituted for love. Alignment with wealth—and treatment of persons of wealth with special deference and the consequent neglect of the poor—are the result of lack of love.

"The Church has lost or overlaid the Gospel which made the Church and which alone can give it value." The Gospel is the good news of the love of God. Its purpose is to call forth that love which comes from a pure heart, a clear conscience and a sincere faith, and the Church, not having aimed at these things, has been diverted to unprofitable teaching—"lost or overlaid the Gospel" with something else.

"The Church does not teach that which she has as a sacred gift to the world." Certainly not, when she fails to aim at love and purity and obedience, founded on sincere faith. "She has, for many years, talked of love, and been silent about sin." Nothing could be a clearer evidence of lack of love; for love cannot be silent about sin, because love comes from a "pure heart." "Love fully satisfies the law" (Rom. 13:10). Love "lays the commands of Jesus to heart" (John 14:21). When the members of the church are filled, not "with a little love," but to overflowing with love for one another and for every one, their hearts will be made strong and their lives pure in the sight of our God and Father (1 Thess. 3:12, 13).

"We find that a high and Christless civilization is more like a wild beast than man." This is because, under the guise of religion, instead of aiming at love out of a pure heart, they have persistently and systematically taught selfishness and hatred. That is enough to account for their present awful condition.

The Student Volunteer Movement

OVER 7,300 members of the Student Volunteer Movement have been sent out to the mission fields since the origin of the Movement. Over one-half of the missionaries now supported on the mission field by the societies of the United States and Canada were Student Volunteers. During the past two years (1916-17) 823 Student Volunteers were accepted by their boards and sent to the field—a larger number than ever went out in any two preceding years and a gratifying result for war times.

Students and professors continue to contribute liberally for mission work. For several years the annual gifts have been over $200,000 each year; and during the past two years they have raised what is called the Student's Friendship Fund of over a million and a quarter dollars, for the relief of prisoners of war and for Christian work in the Army. Large numbers of Student Volunteers (both undergraduates and older men) have gone into the Army, either as soldiers, chaplains, or Y. M. C. A. workers. The record shows not less than 1,500 are so employed.

Testimonies come from Student Volunteers serving as soldiers, that the Volunteer declaration "to become foreign missionaries, if God permits," is a most powerful influence in their lives, to hold them true to Christian ideals and practices. It is learned from many who have written to the office that they are determined to continue their preparation for foreign missionary service, and press out to the mission field if they get back from the war.

Information from foreign missionary societies during the current year regarding new missionaries needed, shows that not less than 1,000 new missionaries are called for during 1918, and the wisest missionary leaders confidently expect a great forward movement in foreign missions when the war closes; in fact, several of the boards, including some of the largest, have already adopted enlarged programs which, if carried out, mean that more qualified missionaries will be sent to the mission field in the years immediately following the war than during any similar period in the past. This puts a heavier responsibility than ever upon the Student Volunteer Movement, for upon it rests the primary responsibility for recruiting new missionaries. To carry forward the work of the Movement during the current year a budget of $62,000 is required. Up to the present our Treasurer has secured $48,500, leaving a balance of approximately $13,500 still to be received.

God's Star

HARRY LAUDER tells a story of a little boy who was walking down a residential street in a small western town, where a service flag in the window of a house attracted the youngster's attention.

"What's the star on that flag for, daddy?" he asked. "That means," said the father, "that Mrs. Smith has a son in the war."

They walked on a little farther. Then the lad saw a service flag with two stars. "What does that mean, daddy?" he asked. "That means," replied the father, "that there are two sons from that house in the war."

It was just twilight. As the father and the boy walked along, the evening star gleamed in the sky over the roofs of the town. The little boy pointed to it. "Whose star is that, daddy?" he asked. "That's God's star," my boy," said the father. The lad paused a moment, and then said gravely: "Papa, don't you think that God has a Son who is watching over the boys in the war tonight?"

"Mother, What does Cocoa Mean?"

"Well, my boy, good cocoa means

This Reo "Speed Wagon" Is Typically American

STANDARDIZATION is going to win the war.

IN OTHER WORDS the American method of making quantities of Aeroplanes, Ships and Guns, Trucks, Tractors and Tanks—enough to snow the Huns under—is going to give the Allies supremacy.

THE GREAT DISTRIBUTION of wealth in this country—the great per capita demand—made standardization methods possible.

IN EUROPE THEY HAVE ALWAYS designed an article to fit the needs of each individual customer—and a different one for the next.

THE COST BY THAT METHOD was prohibitive to all but the few—hence the output was small and standardization—interchangeability—impossible.

THIS REO "SPEED WAGON" is a typically American product in every sense of the word. It is one of the best examples of the application of that principle.

EVERY PART IS ABSOLUTELY interchangeable and any one of hundreds of Reo dealers can furnish you replacement parts instantly, from stock.

THE STANDARD TYPES of bodies have been developed after much study and they are adaptable to hundreds of lines of business.

THEN THE CHASSIS, equipped with driver's cab and sills (as shown) is further adaptable to innumerable types of special bodies for special uses.

THE VERSATILITY—the range of usefulness—the adaptability—of this Reo "Speed Wagon" to different conditions of roads and loads—is almost limitless.

THIS REO WAS THE PIONEER in pneumatic tired trucks—it is still the leader.

STANDARD IN ITS PRESENT FORM for several years, its quality has been proven beyond a doubt.

ITS GREAT SUPERIORITY lies in its Low Upkeep and operation cost.

NOR IS THAT A MERE CLAIM—a statement. The proofs are available and in such volume as will astound you.

JUST ASK YOUR REO DEALER to show you comparative figures of costs of operation and upkeep of this Reo—in your own line of work—and in direct competition with trucks of other makes.

DON'T DELAY. DEMAND always in excess of possible output of Reos, is now more so than ever.

BESIDES DEMAND IS INCREASING while output is going the other way.

SO THE ONLY WAY to obtain a Reo "Speed Wagon"—to be at all sure of an early delivery—and to get it at the present price, is—order at once.

TODAY won't be a minute too soon.

Women's National Honor Medal

for the Mothers Wives and Sisters of the Men in War Service

With the beat of drums and the cheers of the crowd, our boys march away—to Glory. And all along the path they tread are strewn the hearts of women—the women who are left behind. Not for them the excitement and adventure and glory—the inspiration of the fight. For them only the loneliness, the fear, the waiting—waiting—waiting!

Theirs is the sacrifice. To them, who have given their loved ones to their Nation in her hour of need, be the honor.

We give our soldiers medals for valor in action. How can we honor the brave women who, through the personal sacrifice of their loved ones, are making the winning of this war possible? Join the movement and make it a personal duty to see that every Mother, Wife or Sister of a man in War Service wears a WOMEN'S NATIONAL HONOR MEDAL as a tribute to her loyalty and courage. This is one of the noblest movements started since the war began, and has met with instant and general approval.

The Women's National Honor Medal

is a fitting symbol of their courage and bravery. It has been created for the purpose of bringing comfort to the women who have given husbands, sons or brothers to the service of their Country. It has been created so that they may show the world their pride in their gift to the cause of Humanity.

Margaret E. Sangster says, "The medal has been designed with an eye to the beauty of absolute simplicity. It is the work of one who has tried to show the dignity and courage and utter lack of self-pity that lies in the heart of every American woman. It seems a very nearly impossible task to put such spirit into a bit of silver or gold, and yet the designer of the medal has succeeded in that task. For when I saw the medal lying in its box my first thought was, 'Isn't it right!' It is right—just right!"

The medal will not be represented in cheap form, as this would be inconsistent with the high ideals for which it stands. The modeling, workmanship and finish are the finest that American medalists can produce, and each medal and locket is guaranteed perfect.

"A Little Bit of Everything" to tell me that I was out of an article before I sent for more of it. My customers were my stock-takers, and it didn't please them. In one day I found that two dozen people went out disappointed. And it covered everything from can-openers to sewing-machines. I had been following no system in keeping my shelves up to snuff. Some of my oldest customers began to get out of patience with me. They'd scowl at me and bang me on the shoulder and exclaim: 'Why is it that the very thing I want you are always just out of? I'm going to do all my shopping in the city hereafter. It's too much fuss and trouble getting it from you. You promise to order a new lot, and when I come back a week later you have forgotten to do even that.'

"AND was this literally true?" inquired the man in the linen duster, a bit quizzically.

"Unfortunately, yes. But I ended it then and there. Each day I consult my special stock book. Once a week I have a general going-over of everything. I take it by departments and lines. I keep a little ahead rather than a great deal behind, and that one thing has done more to hold old business and build new business than anything else. I really think it is the secret of a growing general store. Have the goods! It ought to be framed and hanging on the wall of every enterprise of this character. But I'd like to ask, sir, what made you decide to visit this place? It's only store?"

The man in the linen duster climbed slowly down from the barrel, dusting the cracker crumbs from his hands.

"Because," said he, "this general store used to be the center of activity. Everything else seemed to spring from it. I stood in the very doorway yond and read the first news of the Spanish American War. I guess my first kid h and my first long pants and my first copy of 'Pilgrim's Progress' came from this store. It ranks next to the church and the schoolhouse. I honor any we conducted general store. It performs a highly important mission in every community."

He strolled further back, stopping finally at the shelves where colored calicos were draped, bolt on bolt.

And then he was silent again, lifting down one of the bolts and allowing spray of calico to ripple out over his hand. Mr. Hendrickson saw him do most remarkable and unusual thing he lifted the cloth to his lips and kissed it, and there were tears in his eyes.

"Makes you think of something?" the general store proprietor inquired.

"Yes . . . yes," murmured the man in the linen duster. "What do you think, Hendrickson? That's the same identical pattern of calico dress goods that a certain little mother bought years and years ago, the day we came over and she rode back with the package on her lap—the pattern with pin rosebuds."

SEPTEMBER fifth was a day of counter-attacks north of Péronne and of withdrawals along the line to the southward. In spite of these heavy counter-attacks the British made progress on both sides of the Lys reaching and passing their old positions east of Givenchy and pressing back the Germans slightly on the front facing Cambrai. Along the Somme south of Péronne and in the territory between Ham and Chauny northeast of Noyon the Germans were conducting another strategic retirement in unison with their retirement from the Vesle to the Aisne. French tanks and cavalry and French and American patrols were hard on the heels of the enemy rear-guards, which maintained their positions only so long as they could worry the Allies and slipped back through communication trenches as the Allied patrols won their way forward. The French crossed the Ailette, took Coucy le Château and won thirty villages and at one point reached the line of March 21. The enemy had withdrawn to the north bank of the Aisne over a front of eight miles and the movement was continuing. The Germans were relying more and more on the light machine-gun for defense. Against the tanks they have as yet evolved no satisfactory defense, although they are placing light artillery in their front lines and massing this fire against the land battleships which have done such a large part in the breaking of the successive defense lines.

The most significant events of the 4th and 5th occurred in Germany, in the making public of two statements, one by the Crown Prince and the other by the Kaiser. Both gave evidence of the change of view impelled by the seven weeks of constant Allied victory. The Crown Prince, in an interview published in the Budapest Az Est, was quoted as saying: "The word victory must not be understood to mean that we want to annihilate the enemy, but only that we mean to hold our own and not let ourselves be vanquished. The moment England entered the war that was clear to me and I always emphasized it. . . . We are fighting for our existence. I repeat our aim therefore can only be to safeguard ourselves."

The Kaiser, on September 5, was reported as conferring the Order of the Red Eagle upon Foreign Minister von Kühlmann, who was forced out of office because he saw no peace to be obtained by a military decision; and, on the same day, the Kaiser telegraphed to the municipality of Munich as follows: "The German people understand the difficulty of the present decisive battle against an enemy filled with hate, jealousy and the will to destruction, but has unanimously decided to devote its strength to defend against its enemies' assaults its sacred soil and Kultur which it had won in peaceful work. This is the same Kaiser who, on June 16, declared that the war was a contest between two conceptions of right and that "one must be completely overcome." And it was the same Kaiser who on the eve of March 21 declared that the good German sword was able to force the way to peace. That the Kaiser and his son but voice the common feeling of Germany is evidenced in many letters found on the bodies of German dead and on German prisoners. The sense of defeat appears to have penetrated deeply into the German consciousness and the future is faced with terror, but still for the most part with a courage and a determination which make the retreating armies of Germany still a force not to be gainsaid nor taken for granted. Several correspondents report warnings by Allied military men against a too easy assumption of immediate victory. The German is being whipped just now, but I will, without doubt, stand somewhere and he may yet strike back hard, if I can. Marshal Foch on September 4 wired to the Paris Municipal Council as follows: "The German rush which menaced Paris and Amiens has been broken. We will continue to pursue the enemy implacably."

Lloyd George, on September 5, made public in London the names of the commanding officers of the 150 German submarines which he had previously reported to have been accounted for. Germany had declared the Premier's statement inaccurate. Most of the 150 officers died with their boats, some a prisoners and a few are interned in neutral countries. The British navy has taken particular pains to run down the perpetrators of the worst U-boat outrages. The list includes the names of Kapitän-Lieutenant Schweiger who torpedoed the Lusitania in May, 1915. He lost his life in September, 1917, at the sinking of the U-80. The list also shows that it took about two weeks to sink the U-44 and her commander Kapitän-Lieutenant Paul Wagenfuk

After July 31, 1917, when he submerged with 40 men of the crew of the torpedoed Belgian Prince on his deck; their boats having been destroyed the men drowned.

THE German retreat was greatly accelerated, on September 6, along the whole line from before Cambrai to north of Soissons. The French, who were near Guiseard in the morning, had passed beyond Ham and Chauny before evening, advancing over six miles along the whole front from the Somme to the Aisne. The British, already over the Somme south of Péronne, forced the whole line of the river to the southward against the resistance of the German rear guards, and swept forward to a depth of seven miles, keeping in close touch with the French units north of Ham. The Americans, who had crossed the Vesle on September 4 on the trail of the retreating enemy, cleared the territory south of the Aisne and dominated the German positions from the heights south of the river, the deep, swift current as yet unbridged before them. American engineers were preparing to throw bridges over the stream, while General Mangin's progress along the plateau toward Laffaux and the eastern end of the Chemin des Dames made it probable that no direct attack would need to be made across the Aisne. The French and American troops on the 6th held positions on the heights near Laffaux from which the great base of Laon, ten miles away, was clearly visible, while along the Ailette the French had reached their front line of March 21, and the German positions in the forest of St. Gobain—the lair of the big gun which bombarded Paris—were under heavy fire. The Germans, their retreat from the Vesle laid the whole country waste, burning villages, felling trees and destroying such stores as they could not remove.

There was a report from Geneva, supporting a previous rumor via Amsterdam, that the German Great Headquarters had been removed from Spa, Belgium, to either Verviers, north of Ege, or to Bonn, Germany.

ON September 7 and 8 the resistance of the retreating enemy became more and more determined, his rear-guards were stronger and his artillery more intense, indicating that the Allies were approaching the line upon which the German High Command intended to stand. On the 7th, the British, keeping the enemy under close and constant pressure, advanced several miles along a front of 17 miles from Havrincourt to Beauvois, while the French bit into the German lines to a depth of over four miles before La Fere. On the 8th, the British were in their old support positions along the whole front from Havrincourt, where their lines crossed the Hindenburg line, to their junction with the French north of St. Quentin. The Germans were resisting the old British front line. The French were within two miles of La Fere both on the north and on the south, and were threatening to outflank the Forest of St. Gobain on both sides. The Germans were reported to be in great strength along what was left to them of their Hindenburg line. They were also reported to be feverishly building new lines of trenches protecting Laon, while there was evidence that they were withdrawing from the westernmost of their positions along the Aisne, to the Chemin des Dames position, already nearly outflanked by General Mangin's French and American army. American troops were still pressing forward between the Aisne and Rheims, where the enemy had not yet withdrawn over the Aisne. Mescourt, with fifty men, was reported to be on September 9.

That the Germans meant to stand and fight was further evidenced by the formal announcement from Berlin that "On the battlefield we are everywhere in our new positions." The British, French and American armies were bringing up big guns and the artillery duel was already on.

September 9 was not marked by any battle movements of great moment. The British by a surprise attack made progress eastward of Gozeaucourt, taking Gozeaucourt Wood, and a range of heights beyond and pushing forward a short distance over a four-mile front. The British lines from Havrincourt southward averaged 5 miles from the center of the Hindenburg defenses, while the French south of St. Quentin were within four miles of the city, in which great fires were burning.

The Germans were definitely at bay, holding their lines in great strength, the tired and harassed divisions which had fought the rear-guard actions of the last four weeks were relieved by fresh troops, the artillery fire was the hottest the Allies had faced in weeks and there was an evident intention on the part of the enemy to stop and fight. It was not expected, however, that Foch would indulge in a costly frontal attack on an entrenched enemy, his strategy of the past eight weeks indicating that he would seek for and find the way around. Meanwhile the recent comparative inaction of the great American army and the massing on its front of new German divisions led some observers to anticipate a great all-American drive for Metz, or a possible German attack against Pershing's army to relieve the pressure in Picardy.

The French on September 10 forced their way much nearer to La Fere. British captures in four weeks, beginning August 8, totaled 75,000 men and 750 guns.

TORPEDO KILLS 35 ON TRANSPORT MR. VERNON. Early in September both Washington and London dispatches reported the authorities as expecting a concerted attack in force by submarines upon American transports. On Thursday, September 5, the U. S. transport, Mount Vernon, formerly the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, was torpedoed 200 miles off the coast of France. First reports indicated that five of the crew had been injured. The ship was able to make port under her own steam, and the final details of the explosion showed that 35 of the crew lost their lives. Senator J. H. Lewis of Illinois was returning home on the transport and was uninjured. A transport carrying Secretary of War Baker to France could not have been far from the scene of the Mount Vernon torpedoing. This transport reached France safely, the Secretary's presence in France being officially reported on September 8. With Secretary Baker were Second Assistant Secretary John D. Ryan, Surgeon General Gorgas and Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines, Chief of the Army Embarkation Service.

THE WAR INDUSTRIES. The War Industries Board, on September 8, made public the order of preference of the industries whose operation was considered necessary to the progress of the war. Food, fuel, ammunition, and ships were given first exemption. Metal manufacturers were put in second place. Newspapers, manufacturers of clothing and textiles are in Class 4. While the list was not made public by the War Department, it was looked upon as probably furnishing the basis for industrial exemptions from military duty under the new draft, but General Crowder announced that draft boards would not be in any wise bound by it, but would exercise the widest discretion in granting industrial exemptions.

His Mother Knows That Grains Should Be Super-Cooked

Prof. Anderson Says:

A grain of wheat contains about 125 million food cells. And they must be broken to digest.

Ordinary cooking methods break only part of them. That's the great trouble with grain foods for children. They are generally not half-cooked.

I Explode the Cells

In Puffed Grains I explode these cells. The grains are sealed in guns, then revolved for an hour in a fearful heat. Thus steam is created inside of each food cell.

Then the guns are shot. Instantly every food cell explodes—125 million per kernel. Every granule is thus fitted to digest.

You see grain bubbles, eight times normal size. You see airy, flaky, toasted tidbits with a most enticing taste.

I see only hygienic foods. These grains are cooked, then toasted, then exploded. Grains were never so cooked before.

That's the reason for Puffed Grains. They seem food confections. But the great point is, they do not tax digestion. And every atom feeds.

Mothers who consult their doctors will serve these grains in Puffed form all they can.

Mix with Fruit

Or serve with cream and sugar. Between meals, douse with melted butter and let children eat like peanuts.

BIG JUMP IN MAGAZINE PRICES

THESE MONEY SAVING CLUBS ADVANCE OCTOBER 1st

Unusual increases in the cost of paper, printing, engraving and clerical help, in addition to the extra postage which publishers must pay because of the new zone rate for mailing magazines, have compelled many publishers to advance subscription prices. Other publishers will make advances shortly.

The Christian Herald has arranged to give its readers an opportunity to procure their favorite magazines for a short time at the former prices. It is absolutely necessary that orders be sent to us AT ONCE—we can guarantee the prices quoted below only until October 1, 1918. Prices will advance after that date—but subscriptions will be filled at these special rates if mailed not later than October 1st.

Subscriptions are for one year. Renewal subscriptions are extended for one year from the date of expiration. New subscriptions begin with the current issue. Magazines can go to different names and addresses except in a few cases noted otherwise. Canadian postage on other magazines is usually 50 cents additional; foreign postage $1.00 additional.

In rough mountain country dog teams convey filtered water from a supply base to troops at the front

ARMY medical men are of the opinion that the health and efficiency of the troops in the field is more a matter of the daily consumption of so many gallons of fresh, pure water than anything else, and in order that the boys can have this water, some of the world's greatest engineers are now in France looking after the supply. They have all kinds of difficulties to contend with, including the constant defilement by the Huns of wells, ponds, springs and rivers, but have been able to successfully overcome all of them.

It was Napoleon who said an army travels on its stomach, and the impression generally created is that the stomach of the army is dependent solely on a standard ration of so many pounds of meat, so many pounds of pure wheat bread and other ordinary food essentials daily; but the medical men of the various armies do not fully agree to this. They are of the opinion that the good health as well as the traveling and fighting ability of the troops is more a matter of sufficient good water for daily consumption than anything else.

Early in the war, the Huns reached this conclusion and realized the advantage they might take of it; so, whenever they have been pushed back from invaded territory, they have made every effort before final evacuation to very thoroughly destroy the local water supply upon which they had been dependent, and thus to retard as much as possible the advances of the Allies. When time has not permitted the filling of wells or the destruction of water pipes, they have not hesitated to resort to the quicker means of poisoning wells and defiling ponds, pools and springs by all manner of unwholesome refuse. Anything in fact they could most quickly lay their hands upon and pitch overboard.

Thus it has been necessary for the water supply units of the Allied armies when the soldiers have recaptured invaded land to devise all manner of ways and means of conveying pure water to the troops from reliable sources back of their own lines rather than run the grave danger of using the probably polluted water found in the regions just abandoned by the Germans until they have had time to test the same,

Quenching an Army's Thirst

to purify the wells, repair the broken pipe lines and remove from the ponds and pools the refuse the Huns had fiendishly employed to defile them.

When Uncle Sam's army Engineering Corps arrived in France they found themselves up against the solution of some very important water supply problems which many of them, coming fresh from civilian engineering life had never been previously called upon to even consider.

There were many strange by-paths and to them unexplored water routes which had never confronted them in civil life at home, but which they found themselves immediately obliged to explore, as they presented big vital problems.

It was necessary for them to answer such questions without undue delay as: How much water does an American horse or mule drink daily? What is the minimum requirement per capita for American troops during an advance? What is the best means of sterilizing water in the field? How can poisoned or defiled wells be most quickly purified and their water supply made wholesome and absolutely free from disease germs? How shall pipe lines, pumping stations and tanks be protected from shell fire? Shall each army corps or division be responsible for its own water supply, or shall this matter be controlled for all of our forces, directly from headquarters? How much water does a soldier need for a shower bath, and how often should he be permitted this common American luxury?

These are only a few of the dozens of questions our water supply engineers at the front were kept very busy answering to themselves or others when they first arrived in France. As the majority of these men were fully trained and highly experienced in civil engineer lines they undoubtedly would have ultimately solved all these important questions to the satisfaction of all concerned, but it would have taken them considerably more time than it did if they had not been fortunate enough to be able to profit by the experiences of nearly four years in war of the engineers of the French and British armies. The valuable data which these men had gathered was freely placed at the disposal of our engineers. Thus they were able to avoid many grave mistakes from which our boys might otherwise have very severely suffered.

In the proper quenching of the thirst of our thousands of soldiers our engineers were able at the very beginning of their work to do for the health and comfort of our troops only what our allies were able to after paying the heavy price of several years of experiments and reorganizations in their army water supply methods.

One great gain in this was that we were at once able to organize our water supply on a geographical rather than a shifting military unit basis. This was a mistake which the Allies first made, that is, of making mobile units directly responsible for their water supply.

The big advantage of the geographical plan is that the water supply force in each district remains continually in charge of work with which it is familiar, instead, as was the case in the first year of the war, of being moved like a hen on a hot griddle from one locality to another facing a new set of conditions, with regard to the supply of water, at each shift, and these having continually new problems to solve.

But even with all the help our allies afforded our engineers they were still up against many problems. For instance, although there is no data at hand to prove the statement it is probable that they quickly discovered that the American troops required man for man somewhat more water daily than the soldiers of the Allies, for we have always been notorious as a nation of water drinkers and users and accustomed to employing water to quench our thirst as the people of other nations have used beer and light wines or at least mixed water and the stronger drinks.

American engineers from civil life have been accustomed to design a water supply system on the basis of a consumption of 150 to 200 gallons per capita per day. Upon arrival at the battle front they found however that water was not always by any means plentiful and that they must reconstruct their ideas as to its use.

They were greatly surprised when they found that according to military allowances for advance areas the consumption oftentimes must be as low as one half gallon a soldier daily. This was when the men were more or less inactive. On the other hand, at the beginning of an offensive movement while the water supply forces were most laboriously extending their lines forward as the troops advanced, they discovered that at such trying times the water supply of the men must be increased to one gallon per man, so that the fighting powers of the soldiers would be maintained at the highest standard, for hard fighting and marching is thirsty work.

Probably this is the greatest and most difficult job that army engineers have to undertake, as at such times mechanical equipment is pretty much of a minus quantity and casualties are constantly depleting the working force.

During an advance the sequence of operations relating to water supply begins with horse-drawn transport by individual military units from existing water delivery points. Then—as the distance from these water bases to the new front increases water tank trains begin to operate up to a point where pack mule or other service can convey the water to the front. It is absolutely essential for the success of the movement of troops forward that the distance between water points and the rear of advancing units shall not be much greater than four or five miles.

To a large extent the water supply of the troops in France is dependent upon the oldest and most primitive source—wells, although considerable progress has been made in the use of river water whenever available, but on account of the constant danger of Hun defilement this water has first to be passed through purification plants and very carefully tested.

After the beginning of each separate movement of the Allied armies the engineers must quickly determine from their knowledge of the country which method or combination of methods will serve the soldiers best during their occupation. What is known as the "water point" has been developed for advance areas in the present war. It may be only an old-fashioned well, the end of a pipe line, a trough, an elevated tank of metal or wood, or merely a reservoir of canvas. Whatever it may be, it serves to establish a line of demarcation between the work of the special water supply forces and the troops in the field—between producer and consumer. The army engineer water supply service establishes these water points at frequent intervals, and divisional or other units must assume responsibility for getting the water from them to the men and animals by whatever means the local situation may demand.

FOR many years we have been waiting patiently for a railroad in this neck of the province. The breakwater at Chefoo is in process of construction. The most natural sequence would be a railroad from Chefoo to the interior cities. Sooner or later such a road will be built, but things move slowly here. We still are using the same old modes of "slowmotion" our pioneers used.

Last summer I made a trip to Chefoo—a distance of about one hundred English miles from Laichow. Two routes were open: First is the sea route, quicker, if one could leave on time. The small coast steamers have no definite schedule. We are ten miles from the nearest port, Tiger Head. Sometimes we can catch a steamer and some other times we go out and wait a nice long wait and catch the next one. It isn't half bad to ride out in carts or on donkeys and get into the sampan and row out to the steamer, some six or eight miles away in deep water.

While I was trying to decide between the uncertainties and difficulties of sea and land routes, another traveler from Chingchowfu, a few hundred miles west of here, came through, going to Chefoo overland. She spent the week-end with us. The prospect of having a pleasant traveling companion decided me in favor of the overland route. She rode horseback a great part of the way. She also had a shantsi, or mule litter, to carry her luggage; also to ride in when the day was too hot. A young Chinese teacher and I rode in another shantsi.

We made the trip in four days. It cost more than 25,000 cash, an amount equal to more than five dollars gold at the present rate. That isn't so bad considering the time spent. The weariness, the monotony, the nervous energy expended, do not enter into the calculation. When you consider the distance, you perceive that our tickets cost much more than five cents a mile.

A good old Bible woman was asked if she got very tired on a recent journey. She replied: "How could I get tired? Didn't I ride in a cart?" The cart was a heavy two-wheeled freight cart—no springs, no seat—fine when it is standing still, not unbearable on smooth roads. If the dear old sister could ride in a nice Peking cart like the one in this picture, what would she say?

LAST summer a young woman in one of the interior cities determined to go to Chefoo overland. Drought had brought on famine. The farmers had no feed for their animals, so it was impossible to hire shantsis. She, in a spirit of adventure, made the trip on a wheelbarrow! At least two hundred miles on a wheelbarrow! She greatly enjoyed it, she said. China's metropolis, Shanghai, with all her electric cars, automobiles, etc., still offers the visitor a nice quiet ride on a barrow.

All Westerners know about the sedan

the lightweight sits on a rock.

I have seen a man with a carrying-pole on his shoulder. Presumably he was carrying meal or vegetables in the basket on each end. Peeping out of one of the baskets I have seen the bright-eyed baby boy going on a visit to grandmother.

chair. It is not peculiar to China alone. Perhaps no country uses it more extensively than does China. It is still used by officials, and brides and grooms, and a few ordinary travelers.

Tourists going up Tai Shan, the sacred mountain, go in a mountain chair. This chair is made of bamboo and rope.

How many Westerners first coming to the Orient enjoyed a ride in a jinricksha (man-strength-cart)? The Japanese should erect a monument to the missionary who invented the first one for his sick wife to ride more comfortably. They are used all over Japan and in the port cities of China. We claim this as one of Shantung's modes of travel—one of the new ways. One of the old, old ways is the donkey with a basket on

Sometimes we ride on pack mules, using farmers' baskets to carry our luggage. When the bedding is piled up to make a comfortable seat it looks perilously high, but we seldom have an accident.

Occasionally when going out to visit country schools I have traveled in a little Western-style cart. It is the nearest like home luxuries we can afford just now.

After a while, when the railroad shall have come bringing evils which usually attend, it may be we shall sigh for the good old days of the cart and shantsi. But I rather think we shall welcome the innovation and risk the evils for the sake of the manifest advantages.

Little Stories of Jerusalem

By MAJOR THEODORE WATERS, of the Christian Herald and the American Red Cross Commission

HERE are some stories which I asked one of our social workers to get for me in the refugee camp of Wadi Sarrar, not far from Jerusalem, for I have found that many of the women among the refugees talk more freely with a woman than with a man.

The lady who wrote the following was for years a missionary in Asia Minor, and has forbidden me to use her name for the reason that the publication of the shocking stories told by her might be used against some of her friends in the places where she was stationed, and if, when the war ceases, she should go back to her old missionary post, the anger of the Turks might even then be visited upon her. However, the anonymous character of these tales does not in any way vitiate their truthfulness:

In a Refugee Camp

A CONICAL tent, with the bottom turned up all around to make pockets for the meager belongings of the occupants; for furniture two or three strips of goat-hair sacking. They gave me a piece doubled up pillow-wise, doing their best to make their guest comfortable—these women, who three years ago in their northern homes would have placed me on a cushioned divan, covered with snow-white muslin and crochet work, and who would have brought me coffee and sweets made by their own housewifely hands. One of them showed me the dress she was wearing.

"This is all I have," she said, "and it is a gift. The enemy stripped me stark naked. We were so tired walking and our feet were cut so badly! When we got to Jerusalem, I thought we could stop; but the authorities were afraid of illness in the city and sent us directly to camp. When they put us on the train, I cried. I had hoped to see the Saviour's tomb and weep there and find comfort. I thought I might have had that after all those months of misery," she sighed.

Another woman, dressed in a futurist dream pieced together with a cubist nightmare, looked up and grinned. "When are they going to give me something to wear?" she asked. "It's her own fault she has not a frock," said the first woman. "You see, she ran off to Jerusalem, and so did some of the men. They put the men in the guard-house, and they told her she could not have a new frock."

"What did you want to go to Jerusalem for?" I asked, for the walk is not one I should care to take, myself.

"What did I want to go to Jerusalem for? To see the Church of the Holy Sepulcher and all the relics, of course."

"Did you get to see them?"

"Yes, everything. What do I care about a dress? I saw everything."

I looked at them both, the women who after all the horrors of deportation had still tears to shed because she had not seen the shrine of her faith, the other content in rags because she had, and remembered the steps to the crypt of the Holy Sepulcher, worn by the feet of millions. Immense hunger of the spirit! Impulsion not to be explained by any economic theory!

From Vessel to Vessel

THE staging of these conversations is, unless otherwise stated, in a conical tent; you know the sort—dirt floor with nothing much on it to sit on; except what there is in the way of rags, rugs, sacking or goat-hair strips, indicates the present state of the occupant's finances. Sometimes there are two families in a tent, and one has a fairly decent rug while the other has nothing. They told me the other day that I should find some fellow townfolk in a tent. The woman was there when I went in, decently combed and as clean as possible. Azniv has a sweet, patient face, kind eyes, and a self-controlled mouth. When I entered, she was chattering with an old blind man and his wife, who share her tent. All her ways show nice breeding. Her husband came in presently.

"The war has poured us from vessel to vessel," he said. A moan went around the tent. "I had a son seventeen years old. He knew French and Italian, and his handwriting was beautiful. I had always sent him to the Italian schools. I had a daughter twelve years old—and their mother. I do not know where one of them is now. I tried to stir up the priest in the city to which I was exiled lately by telling him that if he did not find them for me I should marry again. I thought he would be so horrified at the idea of my remarrying without being sure that my wife was dead that he would surely find her for me if she was to be found. But he only said, 'Do as you please, my son. I cannot forbid you.' I know then that my search was hopeless. I did not intend to remarry. But this woman is a good woman from my own town and I married her. My wife, my son, defaced themselves so the Turks would not look at them." She gave Arjadulis a little love-shake and kissed her.

"You have children of your own," I said.

"Three. Two starved to death and the Kurds cut the baby's throat on my knee. We were in a wood"—her eyes widened and darkened—"and the Kurds came down upon us. After they killed my baby in my arms and other babies and other people, I still sat there, I alive and the others dead, there and there and there," she pointed as if she saw the corpses of her friends around her. "Then a thought came to me; my baby was dead! You will think me a strange woman, but life is sweet. I took up blood and earth from the ground and smeared it over my face and breast. There I sat, there with my mouth open and the spittle running out so they would think I was mad and leave me alone. And so they did. I never cried for my babies. I had no tears. And what comes of tears? But I wish I could find my husband."

The Widow in Black

"HANUM."* A gawky boy with the first black down on his lip stood in front of me on the narrow sidewalk of a Jerusalem street. "It is Vahan," he said.

Gone the dust, the heat, the cosmopolite crowd of Jerusalem. I was high on a seaward-looking peak of the Amavus in the far, far days before July, 1914. A row of poplars rustled in the afternoon breeze from the Mediterranean. I saw myself, as one sees another person, dismounting from my horse on a lawn snowy with daisies, and a woman and her children running out to meet me.

"Where are your father and mother and the other children?" I asked.

"My father, long life to you, is dead, and my brother is far behind the lines, but my mother and sisters are here."

"Bring them to see me."

Next day they came—the widow in black. She kissed my hands, sobbing. "Oh, the good days, Hanum, the old days, that can never come back! They say that some time we may go back to our village. But the dead do not come back. You will be calling my husband to do this service for you and that, but he will not answer. When I see you, the bad years of exile and death are gone, and I think I am back in my village with all my beloved, in the coolness and the quiet and the peace, with the children playing in the village streets and the men coming up from town in the evening. How often I washed my husband's feet when he came in footsore! Now he has gone on the longest journey, and his feet will never go over our mountain road again. Hanum, when will peace come?"

In a letter from Major Waters written in Jerusalem and dated July 18, he writes:

"I have now in course of preparation several other articles on Palestine, including one on the Beggars of the Country, and others on the Women of Palestine and the Children of Palestine. I am going out into the villages collecting material for these articles. One that will be of wide interest to Christian Herald readers will deal with the effect the war has had on the Holy Land, i. e., the old way and the new. Among the subjects of which other future letters will treat are these: The orphanages of Palestine; the health and sickness of the country; how the missionaries have fared; the present condition of Zionism; the wonderful work of the army; how the people are fed, clothed, housed, taxed, educated."

These articles will appear during the coming months in the order in which they are received, and we have no doubt that they will be found intensely interesting by all our readers. There is no country in the world today which holds so warm a place in the hearts of the Christian people of America as the old land of the Chosen People, which is now in process of rehabilitation.]

my daughter—I do not know if they are alive or not. These three years I have not known. The war has poured us from vessel to vessel. My son knew French and Italian so beautifully.—Let me feel them," he said, addressing a melon-vender who appeared with two pale little watermelons at the tent door. "No, take them away, they are not ripe.—My son knew French and Italian so beautifully, and you ought to have seen his handwriting."

The wife said something to him and he got up, left the tent. Azniv looked at me timidly, as one woman looks at another for her verdict. "My husband was dead in the massacre," she said, "and this man had no one. The war has changed everything we ever knew."

On her face, as on his, was the look of bewilderment at the fact that life does so much more to shape us than we to shape it—the look that says, "I could have borne anything except to see myself so discontented, so different from the thing I was trying to make of myself."

Into my ears rang the words of one of my best-loved sonnets:

Time, whose millioned accidents
Blunt sharpest intents, change the decrees of kings
Tan sacred beauty. . . .

"I understand," I said.

The Baby in Her Arms

NIVART was dandling the tiniest of tiny girl-babies. "Her mother is sick," she explained. "You see, Arjadulis is only five months old and there is another baby coming, and with that and the mother's fever, the milk is all spoiled for her. But she is good just the same, the little sweetheart! The mother is a child herself and the father is only twenty. We had to marry our girls to our own men, regardless of their youth, else the Arabs took them. The Arabs were better to us than the Turks. They would not take a married woman by force. But oh, it is good to be here where one goes to sleep at night without fear. They took our men in one direction and us in another, the Turks did. All that long way, the three months that we were walking, the older women tried to protect the younger ones. The pretty girls

Pershing Leads Our Boys to Victory

OUR American army in Lorraine has struck its first blow to regain France's lost provinces. The St. Mihiel salient, which for four years has been like a German spear point directed at the heart of France, has been wiped out. One hundred and fifty square miles of French territory have been redeemed in twenty-seven hours, while some 20,000 Germans are prisoners of war, and guns and material as yet uncounted remain as part of the fruits of victory.

On September 12, 1918, the Germans under Crown Prince Rupprecht of Bavaria, although driven back from Nancy by General Castelnau, succeeded in forcing their way through the heights of the Meuse to St. Mihiel on the river and establishing a narrow salient of which the city remained the apex. This salient they fortified with all their skill and thoroughness, and repeated attempts of the French to reduce it failed to secure important gains. It remained a constant threat against the French at Verdun and westward to Rheims, an outer bulwark of the entrenched camp of Metz, a bastion of the German positions guarding the iron mines of Briey.

On September 12, 1918, General Pershing's 58th birthday, as it happened, the American First Army which had been trained in the trenches between the Meuse and the Moselle, and fought for Seicheprey and driven the German back at various isolated points—fully organized and magnificently equipped, with American guns, American-manned tanks, American aviators and American cavalry—moved forward according to plans formulated by General Pershing and approved by Marshal Foch. General Castelnau, once more in command of French armies guarding Toul and Nancy, had also a share in the plans.

For weeks, the American forces were mobilized behind the front, on the heights of the Meuse, in the woods on the plain of the Woivre and on the hills along the Moselle. The Germans knew this and were expecting the attack and prepared to meet it. Six divisions including some of their best troops were in the salient, and the town of St. Mihiel itself was held by two divisions who were ordered to hold at all costs. Montsec, a dominating height, east of St. Mihiel, was heavily fortified and held by the Germans. The trench lines along the whole front were four or five in number and the positions were deep and formidable.

Against this almost impregnable position where the enemy confidently awaited the blow, General Pershing sent his men forward on September 12 at 5 A.M. At 1 A.M. the massed guns began a terrific bombardment of every point of the German defensive system. For four hours the German positions were drenched with steel and high explosives. Then after a brief pause the barrage started forward. Behind it, singing "Where do we go from here, boys?" sprang to action the waiting Yankees. Montsec was neutralized by smoke shells, which kept it bathed in a fog through which no observations could be made. Along a front of some sixteen miles westward from the Moselle, north of Pont-a-Mousson, the Yanks struck northward. Along a narrower front westward of Fresnes, other American troops struck eastward. The two attacks were the jaws of a great pincers which was to pinch out the salient and pinch in as many as possible of its 60,000 defenders. So thorough had been the artillery work that the German first line was passed almost without opposition, and the second line was reached away ahead of the schedule time. Secretary Baker, who, with several officers of his party, was watching the fight from a height near at hand, remarked upon their cutting of the schedule.

The American southern attack moved forward rapidly, quickly disposing of the attempts of the Germans to halt it. Three Hun divisions counter-attacked, but these fared as did the divisions in lost, Germany dared to issue a bulletin claiming to have evacuated the salient "according to previous plans and without interference."

On September 14 the American line, shortened by 25 miles under what it measured on Thursday morning, extended from Pagny on the Moselle, at the German border, almost straight westward across the plains of the Woivre to Hattonville and thence northward through Fresnes to the old line near Ronvaux. This line was advanced on the 15th some three miles along the line east of Fresnes and along the Moselle to Norroy. The greatest depth of the American gain was about 13 miles. Our victorious troops were standing on the borders of Germany, with Metz only about 15 miles away, and the Moselle, fighting ferociously when there was necessity and at other times pursuing with ruthless speed. Whole divisions swept northward at such a pace that all wireless and telegraphic communication with them was lost for hours, and their whereabouts were unknown until couriers, or the indomitable little carrier pigeons, arrived to announce the overthrowing of some fresh and distant objective. Prisoners simply poured into their hands. One correspondent told of an Austrian major, Count von Schneswig, captured near Montsec. The count and his staff had their baggage all packed and were awaiting capture. One American aviator saw two Germans attempting to extricate some artillery horses. He swooped low and attacked them with his machine-gun, killing one and forcing the other into a nearby dug-out where he was shortly afterward captured by advancing infantry. The Germans were reported to have surrendered easily. Over 500 officers were taken in the two days of fighting.

On the rest of the western front, the action throughout the week consisted of steady forward pressure by both the British and French along the whole line. In spite of constant German counter-attacks, some of which temporarily regained lost ground, the lines facing St. Quentin and La Fere were moved steadily forward and dominating positions were taken and held. On September 16, General Petain attacked on an eleven-mile front south of St. Gobain, along the Ailette and between the Aisne and the Vesle. An advance of between one and two miles was made, 1800 prisoners were taken and the enemy positions in the Forest of St. Gobain and on the Chemin des Dames were made less secure.

Serbian and French troops, on September 16, after artillery preparation, attacked the Bulgarian positions west of Lake Dorian, on the Salonica front, and captured three dominating heights which the Bulgarians had been fortifying for 30 months. A large number of guns, much war material and 1500 prisoners were taken.

A Week in the World's News

UNCLE SAM'S VAST ARMY. On September 12, while General Pershing's men were driving irresistibly over the German position at St. Mihiel, over 13,000,000 native-born and naturalized citizens of the Republic were registering in America for service overseas. In every city and town and village and countryside hamlet registrars sat and filled in little red and blue cards which placed the men whose names they bore on record as eligible for membership in the nation's fighting forces. It was anticipated that the enrollment would total over 13,000,000, but latest available figures indicate that the total might reach 14,000,000.

In some localities the day was made a holiday. Registration boards found long lines of men waiting when they opened up at seven A.M. In one New York precinct, the first man in line had been there all night. They were, on the whole, good-natured, determined, democratic crowds. The American spirit was everywhere in evidence. The rich and the poor, the line and the relentless advance continued. There was stiff fighting, plenty of it. Machine-guns in the woods defied the infantry but yielded to the tanks. One tank captured a battery and seventy-five Hun prisoners. Thiaucourt was reached on Thursday afternoon and Vigneulles early on Friday morning. Our attack on the west reached Fresnes and against desperate resistance made a gain of some three miles up to noon on Thursday. In a country rough and densely wooded, the Germans were fighting to keep open the jaws of the trap while they evacuated the salient along the roads past Vigneulles. The western attack, however, joined up with the southern about 7 A.M. on Friday morning, and the trap was closed. Pershing's men had taken and counted 15,000 prisoners and over 200 guns, while the French units participating in the attack around the point of the salient had taken some 7,000 more. But the salient was by no means mopped up, and it was thought that hundreds of additional prisoners would be taken in the clearing-up process.

but protected by 24 heavily armed forts already coming into action and probably strongly garrisoned, while northward along the former boundary, stretched the Briey iron field from which Germany is digging more than 80 per cent of her supply of iron and without which she could hardly continue to fight longer than three months. The taking of St. Mihiel also restored to the Allies the use of the railways and highway from Nancy and Toul to Verdun.

On Thursday, a few hours after its recapture, General Pershing, General Castelnau, General Petain and Secretary Baker entered St. Mihiel. They were received as conquering heroes by the people who remained, mostly women and children and old men, the Germans having driven away the men of military age. The city was little damaged, the Germans having no time for their customary methods of destruction. A few fires that had been started by the Huns after the houses had been looted were extinguished by the Americans.

According to Cameron MacKenzie, New York Times correspondent, "General Pershing's boys literally romped through the valleys between the Meuse

The Glorious Autumn

THE autumn colors are the crown of glory, the wreath of victory which marks the successful ending of the productive season of the year. The year does not die; it lives in its achievements and robes itself in a garment of flaming colors ere it gives place to the winter. The autumn of life, too, is a time for happy memories for crowns of glory and wreaths of victory. professional and the laborer rubbed shoulders and joked about the days when they should meet in the trenches. Fathers and sons registered together. The sons commiserated their elders because they wouldn't get a chance to fight, the youngsters declaring their intention to finish the Hun before the older men were called. It was a grand nation-wide muster and these minutemen of 1918 were no less certain of the justice of their cause than were their prototypes of 1775.

While all men between 18 and 45 not previously enrolled were registered, General Crowder had announced previously that the 19-20-year class and the 31-36 class would be first called, a quota of these going to the cantonments early in October. The 36-45 class will be called early next year. With regard to exemptions, while none will be made of any class of employees, each man individually will be exempted or certified for service according as the evidence in his case shows him to be essential to some war industry or capable of being spared.

The Provost Marshal-General expected to secure 2,300,000 men from the registrants of the 12th of September, of whom 601,000 would come from the men between 32 and 45. On September 13, General Crowder sent to General

Pershing this message: "The nation responded yesterday with an enrollment which promises to exceed all estimates, thus assuring an uninterrupted flow of man-power to the army under your command."

General March, Chief of Staff, on September 14 announced that the War Department would ask Congress for an additional appropriation of more than $7,000,000,000 to finance the enlarged military program which contemplates the placing of 4,000,000 men in France by June 30, 1919.

AMERICAN TROOPS IN RUSSIA. It was announced in Washington, on Sept. 11, that American troops had been safely landed at Archangel to reinforce the Allied expeditionary forces operating in northern Russia. The report that Samara on the Volga had been recaptured by Bolsheviks proved false. Reports of Sept. 12 pictured Russian peasant revolutionists as having entered Petrograd and the city was said to be burning in many places with fighting in the streets. Meantime the Bolshevik authorities in Moscow were reported to have executed Gen. A. A. Brussiloff.

WORK OR FIGHT. President Wilson was reported, on Sept. 12, to be ready to apply the "Work or Fight" regulation as a means of ending a strike of 5,000 machinists in munition factories at Bridgeport, Conn. The strike was investigated by the National War Labor Board, which rendered a decision through an umpire. Both the employers and the machinists refused to accept the decision. Smith & Wesson, manufacturing revolvers, reported themselves as willing to turn over their plant to the government but not willing to accept an award which amounted to recognition of the union. The plant was taken over by the War Department September 13th. Wm. H. Johnston, President of the International Association of Machinists, on Sept. 11, warned the strikers that they would be expelled from the International Association if they did not return to work. On Sept. 12 it was reported that the President had appealed to the men to take up their tools as a patriotic duty, but it was also expressly stated that failure to comply with his request would lead to the application of the "Work or Fight" clause of the draft regulations. The men returned to work on September 16.

BOLSHEVIKI GERMAN AGENTS. Documents secured by American agents in Russia are said to furnish conclusive proofs that Lenine, Trotsky and their band are paid German agents. They show that the Bolshevik revolution actually was arranged by the German General Staff. They show how the paid agents of Germany betrayed Russia at the Brest-Litovsk "peace" conference; how German staff officers secretly have been received by the Bolsheviks as military advisers; how they have acted as spies upon the embassies of the nations with which Russia was allied or at peace, and how they effectively have directed the Bolshevik foreign, domestic and economic policy wholly in the interest of Germany and to the shame of Russia.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The House, on Sept. 9, passed the resolution empowering the President to establish "dry zones" around ammunition plants. It was announced, on Sept. 10, that platinum was pouring into the mint at Washington in excess of the facilities for receiving it, and the public was requested to send its platinum to the Assay Office, in New York. . . . President Wilson, on Sept. 9, authorized the formal announcement that he had abandoned his proposed transcontinental trip to the Pacific coast in the interest of the Fourth Liberty Loan.

Austria Appeals for a Peace Conference

FOLLOWING an imperial conference, at German Great Headquarters, which it is reported was given over almost wholly to discussions of the possibility of peace, and in which Austrian necessities were said to have overcome German reluctance, Austria, on September 15, sent an identical note to all the powers at war and to the neutrals. The note in full appears below. With this note Austria sent also a supplementary communication addressed to the Pope. In this much the same ground was covered as in the official appeal for a conference. It noted the almost universal desire of all peoples for peace, recounted the futile attempt toward peace of December 12, 1916, but declared that this failure had started discussions which, though disclosing proof of the "not slight differences which still separate the warring powers," have created an atmosphere "which no longer excludes the discussion of the peace problem." The Austro-Hungarian government recognized that "it will not be possible to reestablish order in the tottering world at a single stroke," and that "the path that leads to the restoration of peaceful relations is cut by hatred and bitterness. It is toilsome and wearisome; yet it is our duty to tread this path—the path of negotiation." It recognized also that "The only peace which could righteously adjust the still divergent conceptions of the opponents would be a peace desired by all the peoples." The note closes with the statement that "The Austro-Hungarian Government has therefore resolved to point out to all the belligerents, friend and foe, a path considered practicable by it and to propose to them jointly to examine a free exchange of views whether those prerequisites exist which would make the speedy inauguration of peace negotiations appear promising."

Supplementary to the Austrian note, there was an offer of peace by Germany to Belgium on the following terms:

- That Belgium shall remain neutral until the end of the war.
- That the economic and political independence of Belgium shall be reconstituted.
- That pre-war commercial treaties shall be restored.
- That Belgium use her good offices to secure the return of Germany's colonies.
- That the Flemish minority which aided the German invaders shall not be punished.

Text of the Note to the Powers

THE peace offer which the Powers of the Quadruple Alliance addressed to their opponents on December 12, 1916, and the conciliatory basic ideas of which they have never given up, signifies, despite the rejection which it experienced, an important stage in the history of this war. In contrast to the first two and a half war years, the question of peace has from that moment been the centre of European, aye, of world discussion, and dominates it in ever increasing measure.

Almost all the belligerent States have in turn again and again expressed themselves on the question of peace, its prerequisites and conditions. The line of development of this discussion, however, has not been uniform and steady. The basic standpoint changed under the influence of the military and political position, and hitherto, at any rate, it has not led to a tangible general result that could be utilized.

It is true that, independent of all these oscillations, it can be stated that the distance between the conceptions of the two sides has, on the whole, grown somewhat less; that despite the indisputable continuance of decided and hitherto unbridged for the integrity and the security of their territories.

Far more outspoken than in the domain of concrete war aims has the rapprochement of conceptions proceeded regarding those guiding lines upon the basis of which peace shall be concluded and the future order of Europe and the world built up. In this direction President Wilson in his speeches of Feb. 12 and July 4 of this year has formulated principles which have not encountered contradiction on the part of his allies, and the far-reaching application of which is likely to meet with no objection on the part of the Powers of the Quadruple Alliance also, presupposing that this application is general and reconcilable with the vital interests of the States concerned.

It is true it must be remembered that an

President Wilson Rejects Austrian Proposal

THE official text of the Austrian proposal for informal peace discussions was presented at the White House, by Swedish Minister Ekengren, at 6.20 P.M. on September 16. President Wilson had carefully studied the press copies of the note and after satisfying himself that the official text contained no essential new material he authorized Secretary of State Lansing at 6.45 P.M., the same day, to make public his answer as follows:

"The Government of the United States feels that there is only one reply which it can make to the suggestion of the Imperial Austro-Hungarian Government. It has repeatedly and with entire candor stated the terms upon which the United States would consider peace, and can and will entertain no proposal for a conference upon a matter concerning which it has made its position and purpose so plain."

differences, a partial turning from many of the most extreme concrete war aims is visible and a certain agreement upon the relative general basic principles of a world peace manifests itself. In both camps there is undoubtedly observable in wide classes of the population a growth of the will to peace and understanding. Moreover, a comparison of the reception of the peace proposal of the Powers of the Quadruple Alliance on the part of their opponents with the later utterances of responsible statesmen of the latter, as well as of the non-responsible but, in a political respect, nowise unimportant personalities, confirms this impression.

While, for example, the reply of the Allies to President Wilson made demands which amounted to the dismemberment of Austria-Hungary, to a diminution and a deep internal transformation of the German Empire, and the destruction of Turkish European ownership, these demands, the realization of which was based on the supposition of an overwhelming victory, were later modified in many declarations from official Entente quarters, or in part were dropped.

Thus, in a declaration made in the British House of Commons a year ago, Secretary Balfour expressly recognized that Austria-Hungary must itself solve its internal problems, and that none could impose a Constitution upon Germany from the outside. Premier Lloyd George declared at the beginning of this year that it was not one of the Allies' war aims to partition Austria-Hungary, to rob the Ottoman Empire of its Turkish provinces, or to reform Germany internally. It may also be considered symptomatic that in December, 1917, Mr. Balfour categorically repudiated the assumption that British policy had ever engaged itself for the creation of an independent State out of the territories on the left bank of the Rhine.

The Central Powers leave it in no doubt that they are only waging a war of defense agreement on general principles is insufficient, but that there remains the further matter of reaching an accord upon their interpretation and their application to individual concrete war and peace questions.

To an unprejudiced observer there can be no doubt that in all the belligerent States, without exception, the desire for a peace of understanding has been enormously strengthened; that the conviction is increasingly spreading that the further continuance of the bloody struggle must transform Europe into ruins and into a state of exhaustion that will mar its development for decades to come, and this without any guarantee of thereby bringing about that decision by arms which has been vainly striven after by both sides in four years filled with enormous sacrifices, sufferings, and exertions.

In what manner, however, can the way be paved for an understanding, and an understanding finally attained? Is there any serious prospect whatever of reaching this aim by continuing the discussion of the peace problem in the way hitherto followed?

We have not the courage to answer the latter question in the affirmative. The discussion from one public tribune to another, as has hitherto taken place between statesmen of the various countries, was really only a series of monologues. It lacked, above everything, directness. Speech and counterspeech did not fit into each other. The speakers spoke over one another's heads.

On the other hand, it was the publicity and the ground of these discussions which robbed them of the possibility of fruitful progress. In all public statements of this nature a form of eloquence is used which reckons with the effect at great distances and on the masses. Consciously or unconsciously, however, one thereby increases the distance of the opponents' conception, produces misunderstandings which take root and are not removed, and makes the frank exchange of ideas more difficult. Every pronouncement of leading statesmen is, directly after its delivery and before the authoritative quarters of the opposite side can reply to it, made the subject of passionate or exaggerated discussion of irresponsible elements.

But anxiety lest they should endanger the interests of their aims by unfavorably influencing feeling at home, and lest they prematurely betray their own ultimate intentions, also causes the responsible statesmen themselves to strike a higher tone and stubbornly to adhere to extreme standpoints.

If, therefore, an attempt is made to see whether the basis exists for an understanding calculated to deliver Europe from the catastrophe of the suicidal continuation of the struggle, then, in any case, another method should be chosen which renders possible a direct, verbal discussion between the representatives of the Governments, and only between them. The opposing conceptions of individual belligerent States would likewise have to form the subject of such a discussion, for mutual enlightenment, as well as the general principles that shall serve as the basis for peace and the future relations of the States to one another, and regarding which, in the first place, an accord can be sought with a prospect of success.

As soon as an agreement were reached on the fundamental principles, an attempt would have to be made in the course of the discussions concretely to apply them to individual peace questions, and thereby bring about their solution.

We venture to hope that there will be no objection on the part of any belligerents to such an exchange of views. The war activities would experience no interruption. The discussions, too, would only go so far as was considered by the participants to offer a prospect of success. No disadvantages would arise therefrom for the States represented. Far from harming, such an exchange of views could only be useful to the cause of peace.

What did not succeed the first time can be repeated, and perhaps it has already at least contributed to the clarification of views. Mountains of old misunderstandings might be removed and many new things perceived. Streams of pent-up human kindness would be released, in the warmth of which everything essential would remain, and, on the other hand, much that is antagonistic, to which excessive importance is still attributed, would disappear.

According to our conviction, all the belligerents jointly owe to humanity to examine whether now, after so many years of a costly but undecided struggle, the entire course of which points to an understanding, it is possible to make an end to the terrible grapple.

The Royal and Imperial Government would like, therefore, to propose to the Governments of all the belligerent States to send delegates to a confidential and unbinding discussion on the basic principles for the conclusion of peace, in a place in a neutral country and at a near date that would yet have to be agreed upon—delegates who were charged to make known to one another the conception of their Governments regarding those principles and to receive analogous communications, as well as to request and give frank and candid explanations on all those points which need to be precisely defined.

The Royal and Imperial Government has the honor to request the Government of —, through the kind mediation of your Excellency, to bring this communication to the knowledge of the Government of —.

That Girl from Orchard Street

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS

MARY ELLIS had lived the first twenty-one years of her life on Orchard Street, which lay in the slums of Westport, a suburban town, where her father, despite his occasional drinking spells, had amassed something of a competency through his blacksmith shop. Mary, as a girl, had acquired the manners and something of the reputation of the locality; then the fire of a new ideal awoke the finer nature within her. But the town, while it saw, did not believe. Then the war came, and she began to work for the Red Cross; and when the United States entered the war she joined the ranks of the ministrants to the boys who were going over to fight for the freedom of the world. So well did she do this that she was selected as one of those who were to go to France, much to the surprise of some of the very respectable society ladies of Westport, who had not considered her suitable company for their sons. She was received at the French village of Printemps Vallee by Mrs. Lovett, head of the American women who were ministering to the wounded soldiers. The first night in the village she could not sleep, and at last walked out into the cool night air. There she saw, in a wrecked orchard, a man slip into the shadow of an apple tree. When she challenged him he showed the uniform of a French infantry officer, and, to her surprise, addressed her by name and in perfect English. The curiosity and interest which the stranger had awakened in Mary Ellis led her cautiously to interrogate one of the other nurses, and finally she confided her secret to an eccentric Irishman nicknamed Captain Michael.

CHAPTER IV—Continued

TWO days later as Mary Ellis and the other women sat at luncheon a young French officer, Jean Standish Renault by name, came unannounced into the room and was greeted with cries of surprised delight.

At the sight of him Mary Ellis's heart gave a glad leap. He had arrived! And to judge by his greeting he was a man of high repute. She had to turn away to hide the tears that welled in her eyes as he had looked at her. She knew that he understood.

"Jean Renault!" Helen Synon was on her feet at once, overturning her chair as she made a mad dash toward him. "It is months and months since we have seen you. We had stopped talking about you."

"Ah!—forgotten me!" he laughed as he shook hands with Mrs. Lovett.

"No," Mrs. Lovett said seriously, "not forgotten, Jean; but, then—this is France of 1917."

"Well, I am back—and very hungry. I have driven from Paris since eight—and had a blowout in the bargain."

Three of the women, after hurried greetings, departed kitchenward. In France, as everywhere, a man's appetite is a woman's first consideration, and Jean Renault had spoken of his hunger.

"And this is Miss Ellis," Mrs. Lovett led him forward. "Miss Ellis is the newest of our workers. Miss Ellis, may I present Captain Jean Standish Renault, French by birth, American by ancestry."

They shook hands.

"Welcome—in the name of France I welcome you. Have you been here long?"

Mary told him she was a recent arrival, and immediately the conversation became general. Half an hour later, while the captain still lingered over his coffee, Mary slipped from the room, and went back to her work in the basement of the little chapel. Three women were waiting for her, for she had promised to help them make skirts out of some old bagging material that they had found in a ruined building.

THERE was still an hour to sunset when she covered the old-fashioned sewing machine she had been using and started for the group of buildings she called home. A cold mist had come over the land, and she was walking with head down when she heard her name called. She turned and found Captain Renault coming toward her.

"I heard that you would be at the little church, and took the liberty of waiting for you."

"Frankly, I am glad you did. I rather think we need to talk."

"Yes—I could see by the flash of your eyes as we were introduced that you were going to demand an explanation."

She did not answer him, and they walked along the muddy road, skirting a shell hole that was filled with water.

"Well, there is really little for me to tell you. My work with the army carries me everywhere. Also I have to know many things. I thank you for your silence."

"And is that all you can tell me?"

He laughed.

"You are a real woman, and you are unused to war. Yes, Miss Ellis, that is all I can tell you."

He had been speaking in English, and without an accent. Mary noted the fact, and asked him if he had lived away from France.

"Yes; my grandparents are living in Boston this very minute. My mother married a Frenchman,

She frowned with ugly mood.

"Please do not flatter me," she said quickly. "I did not think that you were capable—"

"Of flattery?" he interrupted her. "Please, Miss Ellis, believe me that I did not think before I spoke. And I had no intention of flattery."

Again they tramped in silence.

"I wonder what made you tell me that," he said abruptly, after a minute or two.

"Tell you what?" her voice was again soft and even.

"About your Orchard Street. Miss Ellis, was it"—his voice trembled—"was it because you did not wish our friendship to be built on any basis that might shift as the sands? Was it because that night in the orchard a new sensation came to you, too? So you—care?"

"Care!" Mary

choked quickly.

"Why—" and she stopped, suddenly facing him. Even though she lowered

her head he could see that her cheeks burned crimson.

"Yes, care," he spoke boldly. "That night when I saw

you first in the moonlight I knew that, of the thousands of women I had met, at last the one who could care

had come to me. It was as if the moonlight had shaped the girl of my dreams—and yet you lived."

MARY did not answer him—his words seemed to lift her from her feet and carry her into space. For a full minute the world reeled, and then from out of the distance she heard his voice again.

"Mary Ellis. I—I am going to tell you something that will put me forever in your power. Send me to my death if you so desire. I came here that night looking for a man.

I did not find him. I have not found him as yet. But somewhere in this great devastated France there is a man no matter what his guise, who is a Hun at heart—a man who is selling not military secrets to Germany, but who is crippling our food—the food on which our men live and fight. I must find him."

"And I can help you?"

"Possibly; who can tell? But I want you to know that whatever may happen I thank God for our meeting. The man I look for—if he is the one I suspect—is also looking for me.

The meeting may be at any moment—and the end violence."

"And there is nothing I can do to help?" she asked seriously.

He did not answer her at once, but stared past her in the gathering twilight. Then he spoke hurriedly.

"I will call on you when I need you." His words were abrupt. "Now I must leave you. Good-by for the present." And he was gone at a quick pace across the fields, toward a large shed-like building, which was used, during the farming season, partly for the farm horses, partly as a billet for the soldiers. Now it stood empty, deserted. Mary watched him go with mingled resentment and amazement. What did it mean? A moment before it had seemed as though he were about to declare his love; now he was striding away unconcerned, as if she had been some servant to dismiss in a moment.

Her cheeks hot with embarrassment, she hurried toward the house. She went at once to the room she shared with Helen Synon, and was relieved to find it empty. For many minutes she paced the floor, wondering, thinking. Somehow it seemed that she had been duped, defrauded.

"Does he think that he can keep me silent by—" she said aloud in bitter anger, and stopped. Back into her heart crept a seed of suspicion. She had been pacing the floor; now she stood very still, and gazed through the window out over the misty world. From one of the other buildings came a woman's laugh, and Mary Ellis resented the fact that there should be happiness while her heart was torn with doubt.

For many minutes she stood, thinking, thinking. All the kindness, all the love that her heart had but the old Puritan blood of the Standish families is still there. I was educated at Harvard."

"How wonderful! Somehow I felt this noontime that there was something dazzlingly American about your manner."

"How does the work seem here?" was his laughing reply.

"The work? Please don't call it that. I feel as if I were guilty of some crime when I think of the years I stayed snugly at home—those first three years."

"There are plenty of Americans who feel as you do. Where, may I ask, is home?"

"A little town called Westport—not so far away from New York City."

"So? I know the place. I have played polo there. Funny I don't remember you."

It was Mary Ellis's turn to laugh.

"It would be pathetic if you did. Westport to you means the big estates and the Garden Hotel beyond the town. I lived in the town itself—on Orchard Street."

He turned quickly.

"Orchard Street? Is that something to apologize for?"

"No—but—" she hesitated.

They walked for several feet.

"To be truthful with you, captain, Orchard Street is what might be termed the slum district of Westport. I have not told this to the others, but somehow I wanted to tell it to you. I wanted you to know right away that I have no social status. I have a comfortable allowance, and some education; but if you were to ask about me in Westport they would soon have you understand—that I don't belong. They call me 'that girl from Orchard Street!'"

"You may not belong to Westport—possibly not. To the big houses beyond, yes. You see, I have met many women in my time. I judge quickly."

held for Captain Renault was wavering in the balance. A spy? Why not? She grew cold as she thought of the fact, and the pendulum of her thoughts swung far in the opposite direction. He was no spy; he was all that was honorable. She would go now and tell him that she believed in him.

Almost unconscious of what she was doing she started from the room. From a chair where she had flung it she picked up her greatcoat. As she slipped it on she felt in the pocket for the toy-like revolver she had carried since her meeting with the captain that first night. She did not know why, but the touch of the shiny bit of steel gave her courage.

Once out of the house she walked in the direction of the place where Captain Renault had left her. She did not quite know where she was going, or what she was going to do—she had an overwhelming desire to see him, to tell him that she believed in him, to have him tell her that his love for France was so great that all else was dwarfed beside it. Almost unconsciously she crossed the fields toward the barn-like building that had been his apparent objective when he had left her so abruptly. As she neared the building she heard no sound. She knew that there were no soldiers quartered there; what few men there were at Printemps Vallée lived at the barracks. She would go closer and call to her captain; if he did not answer she would seek him elsewhere.

Suddenly as a nervous reaction chills one who has undergone a great strain, she felt cold, and shivered. Also she was afraid. With winged heels she ran until she could touch the wall of the building. Then she stood, huddled and breathless, until, touching the wall with her finger tips, she summoned courage to go toward the door. There was no window between her and the door, and the door was open. Should she go boldly in? Perhaps he had gone. She would call once. And then from the misty darkness of the building came a voice that spoke clearly and fiercely, as a man swears when by himself, and the words were in the enemy tongue.

"Gott! Gott in Himmel! Etwas ist los!"

Before she recovered from her amazement, a man seemed to hurl himself from the doorway. As he passed, Mary recognized him. It was Captain Jean Standish Renault!

CHAPTER V

FOR the fraction of a minute Mary Ellis allowed the hurrying figure of the Captain to merge into the mist; then, checking the cry that rose in her throat before it could leave her lips, she darted after him, noiseless, with the stealthy, rapid movement of an animal after its prey. As she ran she drew the small pistol from its invisible holster.

For a minute the man's figure was lost in the fog, but fortunately she located him at once. Presently, after they had traversed the thousand feet that lay between the barns and the road, the Captain slowed his pace to a walk. With rapid steps Mary gained his side.

"Oh, it is you?" he spoke in French, after a nervous start that to Mary's mind betrayed his guilt.

"Yes," her single word was almost a growl. She was trembling with emotion.

"I cannot talk with you now; I have work to do," the Captain said after a moment.

"So have I," Mary was astonished at the sudden boldness of her tone. "Captain Renault—" she stopped.

"Yes?"

"I want you to go with me to Captain Michael."

"Impossible. I told you I have work to do. Some other day I will come back and marry you."

Mary ignored his remark.

"I want to talk with Captain Michael, and you must be there."

"I am sorry; I must hurry now." He quickened his pace. Mary drew from her pocket the hand that held the toy revolver.

"Halt!" she suddenly broke into English. "Halt, or I'll fire; and I can shoot straight!" And she raised the revolver.

The man slowed his pace, turning his body with a hesitating, half incredulous movement. The aim of the revolver did not tremble. For a long minute they held the tableau, and then with a swift spring that started as a crouch the Captain had grabbed Mary Ellis's arm, and was trying to pry the gun from her fingers. She pulled at the trigger, but his big hand held her in such a grip that she could not find sufficient play to move her fingers.

She screamed with terror, again and again, eluding his efforts to place one of his big hands across her mouth.

"Hush—don't be a fool!" he cried. "You pretend that you wish to go to the church with me and—"

Mary Ellis screamed again. The man's free arm forced her head back. The world grew very dark. Night—not the darkness of the evening homes, but the night of death, seemed to close in about her. Suddenly, as rapidly as it had come, the spell was gone, for the pressure was relaxed as the sound of men's voices, and running feet, came to them out of the fog. The Captain started toward the fields, releasing his hold. Mary Ellis fired. The bullet sang close to his head, and he stumbled, and then stood still.

The noise that had stopped the struggle proved to be two soldiers, and with a beckoning hand Mary Ellis ordered them to the Captain's side.

"This is no affair of yours," the Captain barked to the two men. "Go back to your duties. I am Captain Renault."

Noon-Day Prayers for Victory

PROBABLY no one other single event of these crowded war-time days is more impressive than the week-day noon-hour of prayer in Cincinnati. All are welcome who wish to come to the Esplanade at noon and join in prayer for the success of the Allies. At the booming of the tower clocks for noon, rich and poor, high and low, foregather on the broad cemented plaza of the Esplanade. The men remove their hats and bow their heads reverently. The audience grows as the service continues. A correspondent, Felix J. Koch, thus describes the scene:

"At times some army or navy band opens the noon-hour program by playing martial music. The sun shines through the lattices of the white pergola, and its gleams are reflected from the metal instruments. The music attracts many who might not otherwise know of the prayer to follow. Music over, a speaker steps forward on the platform and tells simply and directly of the necessity of our winning the war. The pastors alternate with the days. One day perhaps it is Rabbi Philipson, the noted Jewish divine, who leads in prayer. He is very likely to be followed by a Catholic and a Protestant.

"It is very brief, this service, for in that noon-hour, war-workers, patriots, must find time to eat; but it seems to give a new inspiration and a new hope to all. It calms those worried over loved ones; it gives fresh zest to the enlisted who are about to leave on service. It puts new vim into the hearts of those toiling that others may fight the battle. And all feel a strange and new confidence that the Almighty hears and accepts the petition for an early victory for the cause of righteousness and the freedom of the world."

The men hesitated.

"Yes, it is Captain Renault," Mary Ellis spoke with equal authority. "And I am Mary Ellis, whom you know. I accuse Captain Renault of being a spy."

All three men gasped.

"Yes, I command that he be taken to your colonel. Ten nights ago I discovered the Captain wandering around the orchards. Tonight I heard him talking in German. The circumstances are suspicious."

"The girl is a fool. I will have you both court-martialed in the morning."

"Yes, but tonight I am pointing a pistol at your heart," Mary Ellis said quickly. "Go with these men."

For a long minute there was silence, then one of the soldiers spoke.

"Captain Renault may be on some mission?" he inquired.

"Yes, you fools, and this pig of an Englishwoman here is hindering me."

"Englishwoman!" Mary Ellis cried in amazement, and both soldiers grabbed the man by the arms, holding him fast.

"I have a torch, in my pocket, Mademoiselle," one of the men called, and Mary reached with her free hand for the torch. One of the soldiers rolled back the collar of the Captain's greatcoat, and pushed the cap from his forehead. Mary Ellis flashed the torch in the man's face.

It was a man uncannily like Captain Renault in feature, but he was very blond, and almost bald.

"A spy—an impostor!" one of the soldiers cried. "And Mademoiselle has captured him."

"He is very like the captain—his face and figure—only he is bald," the other soldier cried; then, "the American mademoiselles are all clever. I have often heard it said."

"American!" the prisoner could not help the exclamation.

"Yes, American!" Mary Ellis said suddenly. "Your U-boats have not kept us away; we are here. Take this man to your colonel."

"Mademoiselle will not accompany us?"

"No—I am going to find the real Captain Renault," and she broke into a run as she started in the direction of the deserted barns.

WHEN she had almost reached the door Mary stopped. To her delight she found that she still held the torch she had taken from the pocket of the soldier. She went boldly to the door, with no thought of danger. Later she was to remember this stepping across the threshold into inky darkness, and be afraid; but now she was thinking only of the man she had learned to love.

She played the flashlight about the room—and found nothing. To the right a door that was partly open seemed to lead to a sinister darkness that her torch did not disturb. She went boldly forward. This second room was large, and seemingly empty, save for a pile of wooden cots that were in the farther corner. She went toward them, and noticed on the floor a torn strip of a man's coat. She bent down to pick it up, but it was fast to the floor. For an instant she studied the boards and then she made out the outline of the trap door. Evidently the man who was down there had caught his coat in the trap as it slammed.

Further investigation showed the door in the floor to be very long and narrow; and there was an iron ring. She gave a tremendous tug. To her surprise the door in the floor moved easily, noiselessly, almost causing her to lose her balance. She threw the door back as far as it would go. A flight of stairs led to the cellar. She threw the light before her. There at the bottom of the stairs was a huddled figure of a man. She ran down the steps and crouched beside him.

It was the real Jean Renault!

MARY ELLIS was practical. She had lived on Orchard Street too long not to know the small benefits to be gained by a knowledge of first aid. With a surging emotion of delight she found his heart beating. She carefully straightened out the huddled figure of the young Frenchman, and ran swift and knowing fingers over his limbs. Her first glance into his face had told her he was unconscious, and to judge from the position in which he lay when she found him he had been hurled down the flight of stairs. His clothing was torn, the pockets were turned inside out, and his big cape was gone. She gritted her teeth when she found the puffed swelling of one arm that told her the bone was broken; but more startling was the warm, wet blood that she found on the back of his head.

Knowing that she could do little without aid, Mary Ellis spent but a short time in her examination. Then she ran back to the road in search of help. By the time she had reached the barracks she found the small community in an uproar. The story of the spy had traveled quickly, and the chaplain was setting out for the colonel's headquarters when she arrived.

She told her story quickly.

"He may die; go to him at once, and I will bring others," she sped on her way. She had only a short distance to go before she found many who were anxious to carry the Captain from the scene of his injury.

Tenderly four of them lifted him into a blanket, and tenderly they carried him down the half-mile stretch of road to the portable houses of the American women. The colonel himself came hurriedly on the scene, accompanied by the doctor. The little group about the cot scarcely seemed to breathe while the doctor made his examination.

"The blow on the head has been most severe. Should he recover consciousness he will probably live. The broken arm is of no seriousness."

"And there is nothing to do?" Mary asked anxiously. "Nothing but skilful nursing. I must reduce the swelling before we set the arm. Have any of you ladies done any real sick-room nursing?"

"I have," Mary said quickly, and for the first time in all her life Mary Ellis was thankful for Orchard Street.

Later that evening the colonel came with two of his fellow officers and an orderly to talk with Miss Ellis. She was rather embarrassed at the manner with which they greeted her, and at the flutter of excitement among her co-workers, when the colonel announced her to be deserving of a croix de guerre for what she had done, but she told her story in a simple, straightforward manner.

The Farther View

IT was a wise word in season that was spoken by one of the foremost of England's churchmen, the Right Reverend Charles Gore, Bishop of Oxford, while welcoming a visit from the National Committee of American Churches in New York a few days ago. Accompanying the Bishop was the distinguished English Nonconformist, Rev. Dr. R. Guttery of Liverpool. Both are earnest believers in a League of Nations after the war, which will substitute arbitration for force and have back of it the power to carry its findings into effect. Both represented the British pacifists as now being united in the determination to see the war carried to a victorious conclusion—to make it a war that should render future wars impossible.

But the eminent Bishop sounded an even higher note when he told his American audience that, as civilians, we must keep the minds of men steadily raised to the moral aims of the war. President Wilson above all other men has emphasized those aims. If the great struggle now convulsing the world is to result in nothing better than the upbuilding of armaments, the Bishop said, he would view the future with despair. He believes nothing of the sort—civilization will not go under! But to render it secure, all the forces that make for liberty and justice must unite to make war impossible. The more democratic the nations become, the greater the chance for a League of Nations. Public sentiment must be the motive for maintaining the peaceful equilibrium of the world, and not secret negotiations. Everything must be done openly in the light. War must be made as difficult as possible, and the most efficient instrument for that purpose is negotiation and arbitration.

But international peace among nations is not to be attained except through sacrifice. "We must carry the cross through travail all the way," and whether long or short, it will be the way that leads to the greatest moral victory that has come to the world in twenty centuries—one, let us hope, that while saving what is best in the old civilization, will bring in the new, to make this earth not only a better place to live in but a holier, happier world, in which all may dwell in peace and friendship as God intended.

The good Bishop's eloquent emphasis of the splendid hope that is in the hearts of men will not soon be forgotten. It is like a marching song whose notes still stir the blood long after the music has ceased.

The Peace Note

AUSTRIA'S peace overture was not unexpected. There have been very clear indications for several weeks past that an unusual effort was about to be made, and the peace offer which Austria now submits on behalf of the Quadruple Alliance to the belligerent and neutral powers is the result. We print the text of the Note in another part of this issue. That it will receive careful consideration by our government in due course is the impression in Washington. It is understood that the Teutonic allies unitedly agreed that Austria should make this latest proposal. The fact, however, that it comes at a time when the fortunes of the Teutonic powers are at the lowest point since the war began, is of itself significant.

The Note may be regarded as the climax to a series of public discussions in Germany and Austria, all of which have been preliminary. The Kaiser's dramatic address to the workmen in the Krupp Munition Works at Essen, in which he pledged them to fight to the last, was the first chord of the prelude. Then followed Chancellor Von Hertling's speech to the Trades Union Leaders of Germany, in which he declared that the German government and army chiefs were against all conquests and desired a peace by understanding. Next came Vice-Chancellor Von Peyer's speech at Stuttgart, in which, while announcing that the coming peace would not be one of conquest, Germany would tolerate no interference with her arrangements with Russia, Finland, Poland, and Rumania. He closed with the declaration that Germany must receive back her colonies. There were many other public utterances in both Germany and Austria which indicated that the home situation had become acute and the time was ripe for another peace drive.

Baron Burian, the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister, in a recent newspaper article proposed an exchange of views between belligerents regarding conciliation. He admitted that the military overthrow of the Allies is now scarcely possible, and held further bloodshed needless. He pleaded for "a calm exchange of views" to bring the belligerent parties into closer relations in seeking a basis for peace.

Dr. Lotz, the distinguished professor of Economics at Munich University, in an article in the Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, discussed with disapproval the plan of a "League of Nations" as one that would prove impossible to control by Germany, besides involving a reduction of armaments which he could not conceive of as dispensable. Putting the plan aside, he suggested a radical substitute:

Otherwise there is only one way of escape which would be even less sympathetic to the majority than an international league, namely, a political organization of those whose interests are collectively at stake—let us call it the United States of Europe. We have many examples of industrial competitors who fought each other to the knife, but entered into a coalition when they realized that neither of them was strong enough to beat the other, and outside influences threatened to annihilate both. The result of a similar coalition would be a universal disarmament of European nations as against each other, with retention of a powerful united Army and Navy, eventually under the leadership of a small neutral state, as the hegemony of one of the Great Powers would lead to jealousy on the part of the others. It is doubtful whether the time has come for ripening of such a project, or is likely to come soon; possibly it is nearer than we think.

Another suggestion of the German press, however, is not so confident of the particular value of these forecasts. In a recent issue the Berlin Vossische Zeitung says so in these terms:

The road to hell is paved with good intentions, says the old proverb. Of good intentions we have shown no lack. But the road that we are treading leads to the permanent division of Europe into two systems of alliance, armed to the teeth, directed against each other, and waiting to spring upon each other; it leads to increased rivalry of armaments between the system of the Central Powers on the one hand and the system of the Western Powers on the other, and it leads also, not only to economic war, but to a war of arms—new wars in which our children will have to defend what we have just extorted from the conquered East and what we propose to extort from the conquered West. The road that we are treading leads not to a new order of the universe, which a few months ago we so temptingly displayed before the admiring gaze of the world as our goal, but to a peace that will be hell.

These and other utterances afford a glimpse of the changing tread of thought in the Teutonic lands, and were really pointers to the new peace overture. Let us hope that in their reply to Austria the Allies, including our own government, will stand together as a unit for those principles of righteousness and justice in support of which we have entered the war and without which there can be no satisfactory or enduring peace.

The Victory Draft

THE spirit of the response to the new draft is truly American. Youth and middle-age alike answered with eagerness the call to the colors.

This whole-souled response has furnished the best possible evidence that the people of the United States are settled in the deep conviction that the war must be seen through to the end, and that the only end shall be victory.

To what extent the full manhood of the Nation may be called upon actually to engage in the armed conflict is as yet unknown; but how well known it is that willingness precedes the need and that eagerness and enthusiasm await the call.

The American army already in France, which in its force, equipment, training and demonstrated fighting power has amazed and heartened the world, is but an advance guard of the mighty army which the ready response to the new draft shows this country to be capable of putting in the field.

There is profound meaning in this Victory draft. To autocracy there is fateful admonition; to democracy there is sublime assurance. To the whole world it means that America is aroused; to ourselves it means that our Nation's ideals are to be realized through our own striving and our own deserving.

Secretary Baker's Visit

QUITE as unheralded as was his former trip to the fighting front, Secretary Baker's latest journey to Europe is undertaken at a most opportune time. He goes by request of the President to learn from personal contact what is going on there, and also what is most needed to be done here at home to enable our government to carry on the war with maximum efficiency. It is a good plan to get into touch with the thing itself, instead of trusting to information at long range. While in France, it is understood that the Secretary will study aircraft conditions and needs, the troop transportation problem, army sanitation, the care of the wounded, and other important matters. He is accompanied by Surgeon-General Gorgas, who may remain indefinitely to look after health measures for our troops; John D. Ryan, who has charge of our aviation program; and General Hines, of the Embarkation Department. Each one is the man in the right place at this time. We may look for valuable results from this visit. If the highest attainable point of efficiency will help to win success, let us have it in the last degree.

Secretary Baker's visit means that it is a time for driving in the wedge of advantage with the strongest possible blows. This was emphasized in his brief statement to the press of Paris. "This is a time for deeds, not for words," he said. "If there is any talking to be done let the soldiers now have their say and let them drive home their arguments with bayonet and rifle, while the guns provide the punctuation"; and this is just what our brave boys at the front are doing.

Meanwhile we who remain here at home can give them added inspiration and energy to "carry on" to victory, by making an overwhelming success of the Fourth Liberty Loan which opens September 28th. All of us have friends in the war. Not a community in the length and breadth in this land has failed to send men to the front. Hardly a home exists where its circle of relatives, friends and acquaintances remains unbroken. Everywhere the service flag flies, with its stars for our boys who are fighting in France for the freedom of the world. The knowledge that their welfare and their success lies close to the hearts of those at home will stimulate them at the crisis. Let our money fight for us. Let our Liberty Bond purchases be not a mere investment, but a real sacrifice. Then we shall have the right to claim a share in the coming triumph.

Wise and Foolish Spending

THERE is a renewed campaign throughout the country to combat foolish and lavish expenditure, so that money and materials may be saved to aid in winning the war. A recent investigation made by the Council of National Defense shows that among certain classes of wage-earners, wasteful spending is alarmingly on the increase. The evil is noted especially among women, and is apparently more prevalent in the South and West than in the East.

It is to be hoped that the increased earnings of the American workers will establish for them a new and higher standard of living. A nation can have no asset more valuable than an intelligent, vigorous, efficient, happy labor class. The entire country will benefit if the workman, flush with high wages, places his money in the things that elevate, enlighten and strengthen.

The campaign which is being waged against extravagance and waste should teach the people not only how to save money but how to spend it with discrimination and beneficially.

The Power of Words

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL once said, "Thousands of years ago a leaf fell on the soft clay, and seemed to be lost. But last summer a geologist in his ramblings broke off a piece of rock with his hammer, and there lay the leaf, with every line and vein and all the delicate tracery preserved in the stone through these centuries."

So language perpetuates the thoughts of men, the deeds of history and biography, the beauty of poetry, the glory of literature and learning and the will of the heavenly Father to His children. Are not words the richest treasure of the human mind, next to thought and feeling? Education without language to express the achievements of the soul would become wholly for self, rather than for the brotherhood of mankind. What if all the revelations in nature, all the inventions of genius had been locked up in the individual soul of the discoverer? How useless would have been the vast acquisitions of knowledge! The power to impart in words facts discovered has made possible the progress of civilization, the onward march of the kingdom of truth and righteousness.

Paul and Bunyan in prison wrote words that will never die. The man who writes or speaks passes away, but his words live on forever. It has been said that in another life, words will return to the author like ships laden with argosies of treasure. If by our words we shall be judged, should we not carefully weigh every word we speak about our country, our leading men, our church, our institutions, our enemies and the Book of God? One wrong speech may influence a whole people far more than an intemperate action. The wings of the press fly everywhere with the words written or spoken. Let us therefore be slow to speak until we are certain that we have the truth.

"Let the words of my mouth and the meditations of my heart be acceptable in Thy sight."

Protests River Pollution

THE Merchants' Association of New York, through Edward Hatch, Jr., chairman of the Committee on Pollution and Sewerage, has just appealed to Congress and to the state authorities to take action with a view to checking the further contamination of the Hudson River and its tributaries through chemical waste from industrial plants and the sewage from cities and towns on their banks. The appeal to Congress called on that body to insert in the River and Harbor Bill now pending a clause prohibiting the pollution of navigable streams or their direct or indirect tributaries. In the pleas to the Conservation Commission at Albany, George D. Pratt suggests that it is a crime for the mills in these times of economic stress to throw away the valuable chemical by-products that are contained in the wastes defiling our rivers, and a crime also to poison and kill the fish which could contribute largely to our food supply. A considerable number of shad came up the Hudson this year. To do so, in rounding Sandy Hook they had to face and nose their way through the Narrows, against the sewage of the millions of people of the metropolitan district, and the waste from countless oil factories and manufacturing plants. After running this gantlet of filth and germ-laden waters they had to encounter the filth and poison of 175 towns and municipalities that line the banks of the Hudson and its tributaries. The total solid material in this polluted water from industrial waste alone amounts to more than 1,500,000 pounds daily. It is claimed on good authority that before the wholesale pollution of the Hudson, its catch of shad each year brought in more money than did the farms on either bank of the river. The merchants now are learning to utilize these wastes for their own profit, as well as for the benefit of the public. Worse than the industrial waste and the killing of fish in war time is the destruction of human life by the sewage and chemical poisons of freshwater streams which are drawn upon for the public water supply. Boards of health in the state and nation should see to it that the people have pure water to drink. Water, which makes up so large a part of vegetable and animal life, is used in the Scriptures as a type of spiritual life and of God, who is its fountain. The thought is thus beautifully expressed: "And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." (Rev. 22 : 17.)

Broken Dam Causes Disaster

A CONCRETE dam at Hill, N. H., gave way recently, causing one death and the destruction of an electrical power plant, two manufacturing establishments, several houses and barns, a railroad bridge and a large amount of track. The dam was 100 feet long and 45 feet high, holding back the water in a stream the distance of a mile. In some way poor material went into the foundation of the wall, or workmen put good material into it poorly. A watchman saw the start in the squirting of a small stream at the bottom of the dam and ran down the valley shouting the alarm. All the inhabitants in the path of danger escaped except one old resident. What a fault, what a crime to make bad mortar, or to be careless or ignorant in handling it! How important it is to build the walls of character, not the water flood overflow me." (Ps. 69 : 15.)

Boll-Weevil Doomed

A JUST alarm has been raised that the boll-weevil would destroy the cotton-raising industry of our country. It seemed to be immune to the kinds of poisoning that killed other insects feeding upon the crops. Biting insects, which eat off portions of the plant, can be stopped by poisoning their food; insects that suck the juices of the plant can be controlled by suffocating sprays; and the plant saved. Five pounds of the powder costing twenty-five cents a pound will destroy the insects on an acre of cotton. If the experiment works practically, as the government promises it will, the enemy that threatened the doom of cotton in the South will itself be doomed to death by poisoning. The Jewish crops were injured and sometimes destroyed by insects of one kind or another. The destruction of the crops by grasshoppers is thus used as the type of the attempted destruction of the Jewish nation by hostile tribes: "For they came up with their cattle and their tents, and they came as grasshoppers for multitude; for both they and their camels were without number; and they entered into the land to destroy it." (Judges 6 : 5.)

To Teach Aeronautics

SEVERAL large sums of money have recently been given to leading English universities for the establishment of professorships in aeronautics. A few years ago a man announced that he had invented a flying machine and that the next day he would show the public how it worked. He started from the top of a building and fell with his wrecked machine to the ground, breaking his leg. And the world made fun of "the fool that tried to fly." Not many years later, the Wright brothers said they had invented a machine that would fly. And they did fly, and taught the whole world to fly, and now the air is becoming almost as full of ships as the sea. After the war, the air will be full of ships of commerce. This wonderful discovery of our times materializes the flight of the imagination thus expressed: "Oh that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away, and be at rest." (Ps. 55 : 6.)

Boy Buries Dead Bird

A GENTLEMAN passing through a City Hall Avenue, Boston, the other day saw a little chap with his head and shoulders stuck into a big red wastebasket, and, thinking the boy might be hungry and looking for a morsel of bread or fruit, halted a moment. The boy emerged from the rubbish with a paper box in his hand and said to the man: "I picked up this little dead bird just now out of the street, and I was looking for a coffin to bury it in, and I've found one." The man handed him a dime which the boy declined. The name of the boy was not given in the Boston paper that recorded the story, but we prophesy good of him. He is likely to make a good, useful man. The story of the boy and the bird ought to inspire in us a tenderer care of the dumb creatures, and also a feeling of kindness to our fellows, which is a necessary element in the Christian life. This kindness to others is the stone next to the top in the pyramid of virtues. "And to godliness brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness charity." (II Peter 1 : 7.)

Celebration of Heroes' Day

THE first Heroes' Day was gloriously celebrated in New York City the first day of September. Exercises of importance were held in the parks, churches, halls and other public places, where eloquent orators told of the virtues of our heroic boys who had died in this war, and of the loyalty and heroism of their mothers. Bands and singers were at most of the gatherings, and the soldiers and sailors took part in the exercises. One of the most important meetings was that held at the Soldiers' and Sailors' Monument. At the monument, wreaths and pyramids of flowers, sent by various patriotic societies, were placed at the base of the memorial to the soldier dead of past wars. Carrying their battered standards, a score of gray-haired veterans of '61 marched proudly up the steps. Representatives of a number of G. A. R. posts were saluted with enthusiasm. Mrs. Brisk read a letter of good cheer from Premier Lloyd George to the women of Harlem. Then the audience marched to the dock where lay the Granite State, a battleship of the olden time, and scattered flowers over the Hudson River in memory of the dear boys who went out and will not come back again. Airplanes dropped flowers in the parks and on the river. The memorial day had its climax in the meeting at the Hippodrome, where Mayor Hylan and others spoke, lauding the heroism of the dead. There were 100 black-draped mourning mothers in the front, and as the mayor marched down to where they were and pinned medals on their breasts, the great audience broke into the wildest cheers and cried while it cheered. It was beautiful and just to couple the mothers with the boys in the memorial. The fathers and mothers and loved ones have sacrificed much, for they would freely have laid down their own lives for their boys if they could. These brave youths are not dead; they speak, they live in our memories, our affections, our institutions, and will live in the destiny of the world. Bryant, in his "Song of the Greek Poets," says: "'Tis but the living who are dumb. The voices of the dead sound like a distant torrent's fall." This great truth is thus voiced: "He being dead yet speaketh." (Heb. 11 : 4.)

that are to keep back the stream of temptation and sin, with good mortar and with skill to prevent disastrous consequences! How necessary is the good watchman, who, at the first little break in the wall, gives the alarm, and enables the people to make their escape from the rushing torrent! The psalmist uses the water flood as a type of the spiritual ills that overwhelm the soul, and thus prays to be delivered from them: "Let

but the boll-weevil larva, working inside the cotton plant or fruit buds, can eat away at the plant tissues on the inside, out of reach of both kinds of poisoning from without. The Department of Agriculture at Washington has announced that as the boll-weevil drinks the rain-drop and dew-drop on the surface of the cotton plant, a fine powdered poison can be blown upon the plant and the insect killed in its supposed security

The World's Life Enriched Thro' Christ

TEXT—John 8:12. "I am the Light of the world."

TO us all, there has come of late the inescapable fact that we are living in a changed and fast changing world. Under the stress and strain of a world upheaval our physical, domestic, economic and social life is undergoing daily the process of change. We are adjusting ourselves to a new environment; are living under new legal restrictions and abiding by new social customs and obligations. Through it all there are going on within us equally great changes in our attitude to life and its problems and tasks. We have been forced out of our provinciality and provincialism into a world outlook; an international spirit is rising; our interests have taken on a world-wide aspect, and our concerns embrace the political and economic welfare of all humanity.

And what is true in the secular realm is also true, in large measure, in the religious sphere. Our thought and concern there have moved away from the localized and circumscribed interests which centered in the individual, the local organization, the denominational demand. The religious outlook has become intensive, world-embracing, all-inclusive. Our thought of Christ now, in addition to his being the Saviour of the individual follower, is as the Leader and Inspirer of Humanity—the New Humanity that shall be. And if the future is, as it must be, judged by the past, the question is pertinent: How has Christ enriched the world? How has the world at large, in its toilsome and yet steady march through the centuries, benefited by the advent of the Redeemer? What striking improvements in the thought and life of humanity are due to the impact of Christianity upon it? It is, of course, true that the most vital proof of the supremely divine power of the Christ comes to the individual because of his discovery of its ability to satisfy his soul-hunger for inner peace, and the increasing mastery of spiritual forces; yet it is both helpful and inspiring to trace this same Christ-power in the larger life of the race. And to him who, open-eyed and honest-hearted, peruses the historic page, desiring to trace there the silent yet potent influence of the Son of Man, the vista stretches out like a cloth of gold, gladsome and inspiring.

IN order to clearly and convincingly come to a true decision in the matter we must first find the standard of judgment—the qualities which should characterize a normally just and righteous race-life—and discover whether these existed in the pre-Christian times and how the teachings of Christ and the influences emanating from his religion gave them birth. And as the individual is a type of the race—a microcosm—we may profitably start with him in our inquiry, going from the lesser to the greater, for the experiences of the race are found in miniature in the individual, and the ideals we cherish for humanity are the result of what we have found to be those of a rich, full individual life.

There are in the main three factors to be reckoned with in the constitution of a normally enriched and full-flowering life: the thoughts and conceptions it harbors within the heart, the ideas it holds in regard to the daily tasks and problems, and the hopes and aspirations it cherishes concerning the future; that is, the life within, the life without, and the life beyond. When Adam was placed in the Garden of Eden, a place providing all the beauties of nature and the necessary elements for physical well-being, the Lord, we are told, came to visit him. Adam was not entirely happy in spite of the perfect environment, and God in his inquiry, Ah-ye-kah, "Where art thou?" laid his finger on the root of the trouble. "Where do you stand, Adam, in your inner life, your conscience, your ideals, your concepts of duty and fidelity, the outreaching of your soul?" This soul-life and its quality is the first condition of a wholesome, rounded life.

The scene changes, also the period. Elijah the prophet stands in the presence of God. The man's inner life was right in ideal and concept; conscience was acute and fidelity to the truth constant; yet something was lacking. He failed in his valuation of the every-day task and discipline. His work became irksome, its concomitants burdensome. Life became prosy—escape was sought. In the query of the Lord, "What doest thou here, Elijah?" there is seen the rebuke to the prophet for his shortsightedness and his wrong view of life. Not here in the quiet and solitude of Horeb is to be found the fulfilment of life; the divinity and glory of it is to be found at the accustomed place and in the appointed task; there is the halo of the Shekinah, there the presence of the Lord, there the fountain of peace and hope and enlargement; there, through toil and struggle and heartache, is found the path to self-realization and victory.

Again a change of scene and period. A man, lover of his people, is deeply affected by their suffering and oppression. Seemingly all is dark and hopeless. The children of Israel are in exile, their homeland is laid waste and their temple destroyed. They themselves are largely in despair and expect nothing of the future. But the prophet sees light ahead; the days to come are ablaze with glory and the path is illumined. He, the watchman, sees the brightness on the horizon as of the coming dawn, and a deep joy grips him, and an abiding calm enters his soul.

He sings, he shouts; all is well. "Watchman, what of the night? Yes, the night comes, but after that, the morning." So we have the exuberance and assurance of the glowing words of Isaiah 52. God, the Father, is guiding. Nothing can go wrong. The present is his work and the future is in his hands. No fear, no anxiety, only wonder and faith.

WHAT were the ideals and concepts of the world at the time of Christ's Advent? Strictly speaking, there were none. It is indeed a sad picture that the then world presents to us in the poverty, the absolute squalor, of its heart and mind and conscience. There were one or two localities, such as Rome, Athens and Alexandria, where a handful of people made a feeble attempt to adjudicate life in its higher realm. To us now their discussions and their homilies seem inane, insipid, beside the mark, lifeless. In Jerusalem, indeed, the situation was different, but the point of view even there was partial, narrow, circumscribed, without soul and expanse. The mass of the world lay, so far as the moral and intellectual life is concerned, in a veritable Egyptian darkness. The mind of man was practically blank. He looked down, not up. The earth was hard beneath and the sky was inscrutable and gave no message. It is an appalling panorama, sad, depressing, hopeless.

The coming of Jesus and the Christian Gospel produced the magic change which has carried the world a far distance from the dismal morass of spiritual poverty and intellectual sterility. The human mind can hardly gauge aright the stupendous changes wrought by Christ in the hearts and minds of men. Hardly had a few decades of the Christian era gone before we see the growing-pains of a new world. The outward changes everywhere were the direct result of an inward transformation in thought and ideal. The great truths of God's Fatherhood and love, of man's capacity to respond to divine impressions, of the glory of sacrificial service, of the expansive power of love, of peace through conscientious performance of duty, of the harmonious wonder of a physical world which is the expression of the Eternal Mind—all these came to a comatose humanity and startled it into life and action. The ego came to its own. Under the inspiration of new concepts and convictions, domestic relationships became tender; slavery received its first blow; education was born; hospitals and asylums began to be reared; the state became a responsible entity, and man sensed his partnership with the unseen forces of the universe. Mothers told their children the story of God becoming man. A new life, a new joy everywhere, and ever increasing, even up to the present, because Christ divinized man by giving him an outlet for his inner forces of spirit and mind, and fellowship and mastery.

AND when we inquire as to the effect of the Gospel upon the workaday world, the significance of the daily task and occupation, the value of and reason for the multitude of experiences, joys and sorrows, victories and denials of the common lot, we do not have to wait long for the answer. In the pre-Christian era, life at its worst was a "pot of affliction," at its best a load to be borne doggedly until the coming of death removed it. On the one hand were the vast numbers who performed the labor, skilled and unskilled, of the world; toil which brought neither joy nor adequate reward. On the other hand were the few engaged in pleasure and military life, to whom life was either the stimulus for battlefield glory or the opiate of new-found voluptuous and debauching excesses. To all, life was gray and dull; it had no bright light falling athwart the path of the every-day work and plan and experience.

The Gospel of Christ shed a new and bright luster over the common life of every day. It sanctified labor; it taught man that in every worthy task he is a partner with the Father who "worketh until now," and with Jesus, Master and Friend of man, who was trained a carpenter, who called humble fishermen to be his helpers in world-saving, and constantly taught, by word and act, that "honest toil is holy service, faithful work is praise and prayer." The Gospel inspired men with the sense of the sacredness and preciousness of the common experiences of life, in plan and effort and achievement, in pain and sorrow and longing, in loneliness and separation and bereavement, in friendship and sympathy and sacrifice. Human life in, all its phases, said the Christ, is meant to be the expression of God; as such it is a holy thing.

This lifting up of the common problem and humble task to the highest plane of sacredness and worth has revolutionized man's attitude to himself, to his fellow men, and to the natural world about him. Christianity is the only religion with a vital, throbbing, joyous and all-satisfying solution of the meaning of human existence and human experience. Christ—God as living in man—walks with his children in daily companionship, doubling their joys, dividing their sorrows, and interpreting to them increasingly the higher significance of their toil, their dreams, their relationships. This great assurance has been the anchor which has held men through the centuries—in our own day no less—to their ideals and their hopes, strengthening them in weakness, lighting up their road in the night.

IS not this, the surrounding of the daily walk of man with the radiance of a heavenly halo, taught by Christ, and exemplified by his true followers, the proof both of the supremely divine character of the Gospel and of the enrichment of the race-life by the Redeemer?

Christ enriched the world most wonderfully by inspiring both the individual and the race with the "forward look," the expectation and assurance of greater days to come. The pagan world in Jesus' time had no such hope. The Golden Age was in the remote past, never to return. Men believed they were living in the degenerate iron age in which justice, fidelity and friendship were neither present nor to be expected. There was for the individual no incentive to spur him on to his best effort, no sense of the eternal influence of a good life.

The coming of Christ altered all that. Christianity came teaching that discipleship is a constantly growing and ever expanding experience, with fresh visions and new victories and throbbing hopes for the still brighter days ahead. The journey of life must be an unceasing discovery, with God as the ever-present Companion and Teacher. Life's lessons were meant to be the preparation for greater knowledge and a fuller happiness. The effect of this truth upon men was simply tremendous. It worked marvels in awakening them from dull despair and benumbing lethargy into a soul buoyancy, a self-renewing youth of the spirit which produced joy and hope and victory in the eternal quest of "following on to know the Lord." And this hope, planted by Christ in the human heart, has through the centuries been the beacon light to countless multitudes who toiled onward, suffering and bleeding for the truth, assured of the ultimate triumph of good—of God. They pressed on through inward struggle, through seeming defeat; forever crucified and laid in the tomb, but forever rising from the dead and becoming more than conquerors through Him that loves us, and assured that it is only for a divine destiny that man is hurled

From change to change unceasingly,
His soul's wings never furled.

With equal force came the Christ-message to collective society. The Golden Age is in front, not behind us. The Heavenly Jerusalem is to become a reality upon earth; a new society, built upon heavenly principles of peace, righteousness and love, shall be established. Institutions shall become Christian; human relationships shall be governed by the Gospel. Christ enriched the world-life by teaching that the crowning fact of history is the realization of heaven upon earth, and that the race is engaged upon that task.

This it is which is to hold the faith and fidelity of the pure and the wise, the good and the true. The new day, the day of the Lord, a day of victory, of love, of brotherhood, of the redeemed world and the reigning Christ—that day is coming! And society must live in that hope, and be active in the divine errand to speed it. The world is rich indeed with this hope in view, and must perforce acclaim him Lord and Master who gave men the vision of the Messianic day, and who alone is strong and faithful to bring it to pass.

Broken Pieces of the Ship

SUNDAY, September 29. Acts 27 : 44. "Some on broken pieces of the ship . . . they escaped all safe to land." In the very first sermon I ever heard Dr. Joseph Parker preach, when I was a boy in my early teens, he quoted this passage with extraordinary power. He laid hold of the statement that some were saved by clinging to broken pieces of the ship. They were not saved by a complete boat, but by a plank. And so it may be, he said, in the realm of the soul. Perhaps we are not able to enter, with full believing acceptance, into the entirety of the Apostle's Creed. Well then, cling with all your heart and mind and strength to an article of the Creed and it will land you on the shore! "I believe in God the Father Almighty!" Lay hold of that with all the vigor and complete surrender of a vital faith and it will keep you from sinking. And thus: "I believe in Jesus Christ, His only begotten Son!" Other things may give you no holdfast just now. Well, grasp that mighty article of the faith, and put your whole life upon it, and it will bear you through the swelling current. If you cannot enter a fully rigged boat, lay hold of a plank!

Our Master was always speaking to his disciples about the mighty power of faith. Look at the Syro-Phœnician woman. I do not know in how many articles her creed had been expressed. But there was one thing she believed, that Jesus of Nazareth had power to heal her daughter, and in that vital faith, she flung herself at his feet, crying "Lord, help me!" I do not know how many articles could have been found in the creed of the publican who went up into the temple to pray. But there was one thing he believed; that if his sin and God's mercy could be brought together, the foul waters of his life would be made clean. And in that faith he ventured on his humble cry, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" And the publican went down to his house justified. There is a dark, sin-stricken soul in one of Kingsley's stories who, in the burdensome sense of filthy oppression, goes out into the night crying, "God!—God!—God!" It was only a broken piece of the ship, but it carried him home.

Electricity can run through very slender wires. And the energies of saving grace can enter the life through the medium of a very unfinished creed. It is our faith that establishes vital communion, and even though the wire be slender, the redeeming power is given. Every heart-cry opens Heaven's gate. We need not wait until we can put an intelligent seal to the Apostle's Creed. Let the soul cry out "Father!" Let the soul cry out "Saviour!" Let the weary heart cry for God's bosom, and God's rest shall surely be found. The faith which is exercised will soon be enlarged, for there is nothing which is more rapidly nourished or which more quickly puts on strength than a faith which is lived out in the Lord our God. J. The Word of a King

MONDAY, September 30. Eccles. 8 : 4. "Where the word of a king is, there is power." Familiar is the story of the Oriental monarch from whom a condemned prisoner asked for a goblet of water. The king bade a servant provide the goblet of water and said to the thirsty man, "You shall not die until you have drained the glass." The moment the prisoner took the glass into his hand he emptied the water on the ground and defied the king to recover it. The king had given his word that the man should not die until he had drunk the water, and now he could never drink it. The king's word was inviolate. He had unintentionally commuted the death-sentence. It is said another monarch, to whom a favorite had applied for a great favor, inquired, "Is that not too much to ask of me?" The favorite replied, "Nothing is too much to ask of a king." Queen Elizabeth had a courtier who hesitated to go on a mission, lest his business suffer in his absence. She said, "Do you suppose I would allow you to suffer loss while you are doing my work?" The word of a monarch is supposed to be inviolate, liberal and just. It was said of a Cæsar that he found Rome built of bricks and left it built of marble. The word of an emperor has power. Particularly was this true in the East, where most of our Scriptures were written. He who wrote this proverb may have thought only of human monarchs. There was another Biblical writer who spoke of the power of the Word of the King of kings: "The Word of God is quick and powerful."

Jesus thought of himself as a King, and his thoughts were royal. How powerful too are his words! He promised that his words should never pass away, and spoke of his power as embracing earth and heaven. Was he deluded? Nay, he was a King. All other kings have been his vassals. And his word—is it not powerful? It has not passed away. It has power over the intellects, emotions, consciences and wills of men. The keenest minds and holdest souls of earth have been proud to be augurers of Christ's empire. The universe is full of power, but the power of mind is superior to that of natural forces, and the power of soul is superior to that of mind. Christ breathed soul into this world and changed its chilly atmosphere to warmth. The power of Christ's word is the power of eternal purpose and eternal love. C. C. A.

The Soul's Search After God

TUESDAY, October 1. John 17 : 3. "This is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." There is not a question which in importance equals the question: Is there a God, or not? Nor is there a problem with the solution of which the mind of man has wrestled worthier of his best efforts than the problem: Who and what is God? Human science has proposed great aims for its achievements and has scored many remarkable successes. Geographers have traversed the continents and the seas and have given us masterful descriptions of every part of our globe. Geologists have studied the bowels of the earth and have watched the causes which produce wonderful changes in large masses of land and water. In the silence of the night the eye of the astronomer sweeps the starry heavens and has wrested from the stellar bodies the secret of their precise and orderly movements. The chemist has reduced to strict formulae the laws which govern inanimate matter. The physician has studied the mysteries of human life, the historian the rise and fall of nations. The artist has sought to present to us the beautiful, the philosopher the true, the jurist the right, the mechanic the useful.

All these are noble occupations and the results achieved in their pursuit deserve the praise of all men. But the question concerning the divine Being overtops all others. Before the great savants of his day, Paul declared this to be the highest task set for man, "to seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him." Not until this task has been accomplished, the mind of man obtains that satisfaction which David enjoyed when he said: "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none on earth beside thee!" In the text before us, Christ draws even the future happiness of men within the confines of the question regarding the true God, and at the same time points to the answer when he says that the knowledge of God must commence with the knowledge of Jesus, whom God has sent to declare him to men.

God in the Hearts of His Children

WEDNESDAY, October 2. Acts 17 : 23. "To the unknown God." In speaking of the death of John Fiske, the celebrated historian, his biographer says, "And his spirit peacefully passed to the great unknown." To the Christian believer, God is not the great Unknown, for in him we live and move and have our spiritual being. We know him whom we have believed. He is our loving Father, our forgiving God. He has manifested himself unto us by his Son and by his Holy Spirit. He raised Christ from the dead that we might know his resurrection power.

God is a spirit who dwelleth not in temples or idols but in hearts; his physical forces are in nature; his spiritual power in souls. He is not far from every one of us; truly, "Thou art near, O Lord"; nearer than breathing, closer than the body to the spirit.

What a vast difference there is between finding out God by philosophizing and by his presence in the soul!

The monument over the grave of John Fiske is a large wrought stone of granite, symbolizing the universe. Out of this massive rock is carved a sphere, the symbol of motion or evolution, representing the development of man out of plant and animal. At the top of the sphere is a hand holding a torch, an emblem of conscious power, illuminating the pathway to immortality. There are no symbols on the stone indicating God the Father, Christ the Saviour, or the words of the Holy Scripture guiding to God. It represents the human mind vainly feeling after God, without the aid of faith or Divine revelation. How cold appears such a monument when we think of the great heart of the loving Father, in whose everlasting arms enfolded is the child of his bosom! E. W. C.

Spiritual Partnership

THURSDAY, October 3. Rev. 3 : 10. "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation." Religion is not a thing of barter and sale, but there is a clear relation between what we do and what God does. Divine power and human agency must co-operate. We bring in the tithes; God pours out the blessing. We repent; God converts. We consecrate; God sanctifies. We sow and cultivate; God gives the increase. It is true, "Without Me, ye can do nothing"; but it is also true, "Without you I can do nothing." The omnipotent Christ could do no mighty works in some parts because of the people's unbelief.

We make much of our dependence upon God, and rightly so. But do we make as much as we should of God's dependence upon us? Are not the branches as necessary to the vine as the vine is to the branches?

A manufacturer wrote to his superintendent, "Tell all the workers I am counting on them to do their utmost." They responded to his appeal all the more readily because he had done much for them. The Father gave this message to the Son when Jesus came into the world: "Tell men and women and children I am counting on them." He is. He left to us the completion of the work the Son "began to do and teach." If we keep the word of his patience, he will keep us—keep us in perfect peace, keep us in his comforting love, keep us until "the day of Jesus Christ."

The New Birth

FRIDAY, October 4. John 3 : 4. "Nicodemus saith unto him, How can a man be born when old?" The embarrassment of Nicodemus, in view of the statement of the Lord regarding the necessity of being born again, is very instructive. It shows that there is an utter inability even in enlightened men to comprehend the depravity of the natural, flesh-born man and the divine remedy which is proposed for the cure of this evil.

As a dead person is ignorant of his death and does not bewail his condition, so natural man is without due perception of his misery and incapacity. He may excel in worldly intelligence, he may be highly cultured, skilled in every art, and of high social standing. Moreover, in a worldly and human view, he has a right to demand of his fellow men that they should consider these perfections when they sit in judgment upon him. But Jesus is not trying Nicodemus like a secular court but like the omniscient Judge of all the earth. In his eyes shall no flesh be justified by its moral worth or outward religiousness. This is the way in which he proposes to make the unworthy fit to enter his kingdom: "When we were dead in trespasses and sins, he has quickened us." He has given us a new birth. Regeneration is a figurative term, expressing, however, a real event.

In regeneration, life is begotten where there was no life before. This most necessary initial step in our spiritual existence must, accordingly, be a work of God. Peter so viewed it when he declared that he and his fellow believers had been "begotten again by the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, according to his abundant mercy." We do not comprehend in a reasonable manner the process of this birth; we shall always be inclined to ask with Nicodemus: How can this be? But we are filled with wonder and gratitude when we see the work accomplished in a given instance for we observe that the regenerate person has indeed become completely changed, that he is become a new creature, through regeneration. The High Mission of the Mother

SATURDAY, October 5. Solomon's Song 3 : 11. "Behold King Solomon with his crown wherewith his mother crowned him." No wonder the noblest men have uttered the sweetest words of tongue or pen about her who is dearest of all loved ones. Even they could express but little of the beautiful devotion of motherhood. For from her did we not learn our child-like faith in God? Did she not teach us to be good and do good, dedicating us from infancy to the service and love of the heavenly Father? Thinking about the angel-mother is almost enough to transfigure the soul into the likeness she bore of her blessed Master.

A friend asked a rich Roman matron to see her most precious jewels; she immediately gathered her children around her and said, "These are my jewels." Every mother knows that these may be stars in her crown of rejoicing forever. Her children have a beginning in parenthood, but no ending in God's endless years.

It is thus parents can help adorn their children with the beautiful crown of character, and these redeemed ones become their own crown in the presence of the Lord at his coming. Faithfulness in the family brings its own reward in pearls of purity, gems of peace and diamonds of gracefulness that will never cease to shine. E. W. C.

Questions and Answers

READER, Tivoli-on-Hudson, N. Y. There are things that cannot be explained by intellectual processes, yet we know them to be facts. The Gospel appeals to the hearts and consciences of men and women with a power that no other subject, however ably presented, can equal. The Fatherhood of God, his love for us, the message of salvation to a sinful world, the joy of salvation through union with Christ, these, as you may remember, Paul described as being "to the Greeks foolishness"; yet the Greeks were a leading intellectual race. All their scholarship and reasoning had not led them out of the darkness of heathenism. They worshipped an "unknown God." We find in the lives of many today a similar condition. The god they believe in they invest with the qualities they themselves deem most fitting. Now, the Christian believes that the life and teachings of Jesus, indeed his whole ministry, was a revelation of God. He taught men of the divine love and forgiveness, and of the future life. A preacher may proclaim a beautiful philosophy; he may try to win men by intellectual power, by skillful reasoning and by appealing to the best there is in man; but this is the limit of his power, and must end in failure and disappointment, unless he also preaches the Gospel as the revelation and sure promise of the life hereafter. We are not surprised that some preachers who depend wholly upon their intellectual powers fail to succeed. Their talent, minus the Gospel, cannot touch the heart or quicken the conscience. It has no clear objective. The parable of the blind trying to lead the blind has an apt application in such cases, for a man cannot give what he has not to give. The human soul, seeking after God and righteousness, is drawing from an empty cistern at services which do not give him access to the wells of salvation through the Gospel. On the other hand, we have seen preachers who had no claim of eloquence, or to any marked degree of intellectual ability, preach the Gospel with spiritual power and win souls. They had Christ in their hearts and could tell of salvation from their own experiences. Besides, the Lord never fails to equip his faithful messengers with words and utterance, as he did in the case of Moses when he chose to lead Israel. Moody was such a man, Richard Weaver was another, and many more might be named. The secret of their power was their strong faith in God, their union with Christ as Saviour, and their readiness for service.

Student, Los Angeles, Calif. The article on the Christian Herald editorial page of July 31, "Locusts and Airplanes," contains a very interesting thought. There is some speculation here among Bible students as to our present-day licensing system being used later on by some unscrupulous person to fulfill Rev. 13:17. Some have said it would be the Kaiser, because he is seeking world domination, but we don't believe the Kaiser is going to win in this war. In reading the context, we find that this person will have great influence and power, while the Kaiser is perhaps the most unpopular man on earth today.

The whole question is speculative. Dr. Gray has written on the subject in the Christian Herald, and we cannot see the advantage of further discussion.

S. E. McD., Covington, Ky. Whether the Kaiser really claims to be a lineal descendant of Attila the Hun, as your letter states, we cannot say, but he evidently has a warm admiration for Attila. On one occasion, he has been quoted as advising his troops to strike hard, and make themselves terrible "like Attila's Huns." Moreover, one of Wilhelm's sons, Prince Eitel, bears the same name as the Hunnish leader, in the modern German form.

J. C. B., Dallas, Texas. Your congratulatory message to your friend is timely and well deserved.

E. F. B., Tucumcari, N. M. "I earnestly hope that there will be this year a great national reform in the matter of the observance of Christmas. Let us eliminate the things that are burdensome, foolish, and extravagant. We must not squander millions of dollars on useless holiday 'junk.' The money will be badly needed for other things. Let the women this year be relieved of the great burden that the holiday in recent years has put upon them. Christian leaders should give wise counsel and direction in this matter."

Reader, Los Altos, Calif. Should not the Christian Herald, with its power to be heard all over this nation, enter a stern protest against the general failure to give the glory of those wonderful victories of the Allied armies, and particularly of the American soldiers, to God, who as plainly responded to that day of prayer in this nation, as he did to the day of prayer and humiliation in those dark days of our Civil War when Lincoln called us to our knees? Our leaders have done well in the guidance of the nation, and should be given full credit; but God must not be robbed of his due.

We entirely agree with the spirit of our friend's letter. God's hand is leading this nation, and prayers for forgiveness and for the success of our armies have been heard and are now being gloriously answered. We owe thanks to him as a nation, as communities, as churches, and as individuals. "Them that honor me I will honor." (1 Sam. 2:30.)

Augusta G., Knoxville. 1. The churches did respond generally and enthusiastically to the President's prayer proclamation, and so also did many other allied organizations and the nation as a whole. 2. Since your letter was written, Congress has acted on the liquor question, as noted in the Christian Herald.

Puzzled, Bridgeport, Conn. 1. We consider the hygienic reasons sufficient. Modern medical science holds that marriages between blood relations is to be discouraged. 2. See 11 Cor. 6:14-18. This stands today as a general rule of Christian conduct. However, we are not to judge those who, knowing the danger, may have the courage to face it. See 1 Cor. 7:14, and subsequent verses. 3. Time is changing the prevailing attitude concerning many amusements and liberalizing it, sometimes too far, we think. A good plan when in doubt is to decide to do nothing whereby a brother (or sister) might be led to offend—to make our individual conduct exemplary by avoiding even "the appearance of evil." 4. Strictly speaking, a business which can only be conducted successfully by doing things which your conscience disapproves is a good business to get out of. At the same time we feel that this might be a too severe criticism, since there are many things which an outsider is apt to misjudge and misunderstand, that might seem quite different when fully explained. We are not to assume to judge others.

Rev. D. S., Detroit, Mich. "I notice in your Mail-Bag, page 830, July 10 issue, an answer to Reader, Deposit, N. Y., in which you say: 'The people of Israel, i. e., the northern kingdom, were absorbed in the surrounding nations and are consequently lost.' If your statement is true, then the predictions concerning them, i. e., the northern kingdom, many of which were made after they were carried into the Assyrian captivity, are untrue, and discredit through default all prophecy. There are very many specific predictions foretelling their future national greatness, and their part in the world's development. I do not now mean the Jews; they have their place in God's plan; but as surely as the predictions concerning the Jews are now and have been meeting their literal fulfillment, so too must the specific predictions concerning Israel of the northern kingdom be fulfilled. They were to be taken to another country, or rather countries, there to develop into the greatest and most powerful of the nations of the world. See 11 Sam. 7:10, Jer. 30:2, 10, all of chapter 31, Jer. 3:18, Ex. 37, all of it, especially verses 15-22. The references are too numerous to note here."

Mrs. J. G. McP., Norton, Va. The criticism is just. God alone is supreme over all. He created all men of one blood, and all are equally entitled to regard the earth as a common heritage. This equality of the races is seen in the great war now being fought for world-freedom. Black, white, red, yellow, and brown are fighting shoulder to shoulder for the same great cause and all are helping to win victories.

C. A. C., London, Canada. The twenty-three nations lined up against Germany are as follows: Belgium, Brazil, China, Costa Rica, Cuba, France, Great Britain, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, Italy, Japan, Liberia, Montenegro, Panama, Portugal, Rumania, Russia, San Marino, Serbia, Siam, United States and Uruguay. Not all of these countries have sent soldiers to the field, but all have declared themselves hostile to Germany. The united populations of all the countries at war, including the Central powers, are said by a statisti-

J. T., Ashland, Neb. 1. Demoniac possession has proved a difficult subject for many good people. It is only fair to admit that theological opinion is divided on the subject yet there are cases of present-day insanity which assume a violent and destructive character, that bear strong resemblance to those cases cited in the Bible narratives. It is certain that the early Church believed in it. 2. We never heard of the incident mentioned in your letter.

Christian Schools in China Need Help

EVERY paper and magazine from the States tells us how our good people at home are hacking up the boys in the trenches with bonds, Red Cross subscriptions and many other means, which all makes us proud of the country we hail from. God bless her! It is a grand example to put up to the Chinese. If you get into this Centenary business as heartily as into Liberty Loans and Red Cross drives, we could flood old China with Christian literature, schools, preaching and praying. We must strike now! The boys and the girls will come to us. But without the same kind of backing that the boys in the trenches have from the home folks, our work here for Christ at this critical time will have to re-trench. If we had the means we could hire good teachers, run full schools, and build up strong Christian characters; but I must confess that as things are now I am so ashamed of some of our schools here about Chang that I have ordered one to close and am threatening to close others. We may have to close out part of our Higher Primary School here at Changli in the fall. Must Christ's advance guard retreat?

We are in the war and ought to see it through to the finish; but the war the church is waging on sin here in the foreign field must not slacken. Starvation, plague and disease, resulting from sin, ignorance and superstition are ravaging this land. If you could only see the purity of childhood blasted—lives ruined by the tens of millions—blighted and disfigured by ignorant mothers. Recently a mother about here sent a child for morphine. The child begged to have an injection of the drug. Finally the mother yielded; and now the child is a wreck.

The Christian School has the message that can heal this "open sore of the world." Once the children would not come to us; but now they will come. Our ability to help, to save is sadly limited. Consecrated Chinese teacher teach for far less than they could get in other positions. Parents gladly send their children to us, because they feel that they are safe in our hands. China believes in schooling; she has accepted the western learning. Surely, with opportunity at our feet, the church will not hesitate to advance. If we will do our part, what God will do through his Spirit no one dares tell. HENRY H. ROWLAND.

The Forgotten Line

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

SOMEHOW I couldn't seem to get to sleep last night. And as I lay awake, staring across the dark chasm that by daylight is my bedroom, I tried to amuse myself by making up rhymes—silly, inconsequential nonsense rhymes. It helps, when one is sleepless, to make up rhymes—helps most tremendously. For when one can't go to sleep one is quite apt to get nervous, and it's a horrid thing to lie awake and be nervous.

So I made up rhymes, silly little jingles that helped the minutes to pass more quickly. And, as I was making them, suddenly out of the darkness a wonderful line came to me—a line that was rhythmical, and beautifully worded, and throbbing with a really big idea. And I sat up in bed, and said it over and over to get the sound of it.

"Tomorrow," I told myself, "I will make that line the foundation of a really worth-while poem. Tomorrow I will write other lines to go with it. I will make a poem that people will read and love—a poem that, perhaps, will help people!" And I lay down again.

Perhaps composing the rhymes had made me drowsy. For I found myself, who had been so sleepless, struggling with sleep. And yet, as I was drifting into dreams, the line kept coming back to me—a beautiful line that sang itself into my consciousness. And I wondered, half awake as I was, if it wouldn't be a good idea to get up, and light the light, and put the line down on paper. And, as I was wondering, I fell asleep.

The next morning, while I was dressing, I thought of that line of poetry. But, to my horror, I found that I could not remember how it went. I could only remember, and very vaguely, that it had to do with a garden place. And I sat down at my desk, with a pencil in my hand, and tried to think of the words that had flowed so smoothly the night before. And I couldn't. And I knew that the poem—the poem that would have been a worth-while poem—was lost forever.

"If I had only gotten up," I told myself regretfully, "I would never have lost that line. If I had only had enough ambition to light the light and put it down on paper I could have written a poem that I would have been proud of. But I didn't!"

IT'S so easy—so very easy—to let a real thing of value slip by because it's inconvenient to make sure of it. It would have been rather uncomfortable for me to get up, there in the night, and light the light, and write down that line of verse. And because it would have been inconvenient I didn't do it. And so I lost the line, and, because of the line, a whole poem.

Once, when I was a very little girl, I remember going to play with another very little girl who had a most beautiful doll's house. It was a doll's house that was furnished in the most careful imitation of a real house, with tables and chairs and beds, and—crowning touch—a tiny make-believe piano. Sometimes, when the day was warm, we would move the furniture out on the lawn and play with it there. The house, itself, was too large to move.

I remember going to play with the little girl. And I remember how, because it was summer and the playroom was stuffy, we moved the prettiest of the doll furniture, including the piano, out to the lawn. And we played there, with our dolls, through the whole of a very happy afternoon.

We played until the little girl's mother came out to tell us that it was tea-time. "Gather up the playthings carefully," she told us, "and bring them in. And hurry—there's something specially nice for tea!"

We hurried. We gathered the doll house furniture into our little ruffled aprons, which we held gingerly by the corners. And we ran into the house with them, and laid them down on the playroom floor. It was only then that we noticed that the piano was missing. "We—we must have dropped it!" I cried in panic. "We must go back for it!"

The little girl who owned the piano looked nonplussed for a moment. And then, "Oh, bother!" she said, "we'll go out and get it after tea is over. Mother said that she had something specially nice for tea!"

The something "specially nice" was ice cream. And on a warm summer day what childish heart wouldn't forget anything—even a toy piano—over a heaping saucer of ice cream? My little friend and I, reveling in a quite unexpected party, forgot the piano completely, and didn't remember it even after tea was over.

IT rained that night. And the next morning it was still raining. And so, in raincoat and rubbers, I went over again to my friend's house to play with her and with her doll's house. And it was there, as we were picking the furniture up from the floor and putting each article in its proper place, that we remembered the loss of the piano.

"We left it," said my little friend in a hushed voice, "on the lawn!"

"And," I wailed, "it's been raining all night!"

We went out, with an umbrella, to rescue it. And there on the lawn, where we had been playing the afternoon before, we found the remains of the toy piano. It was scarcely recognizable, for its flimsy wood was broken and its varnish was washed away, and the glue that had held it together had melted in the pelting rain. And we looked at each other with tears in our eyes, and knew that we were to blame. And the knowledge didn't help to make the loss any easier!

Looking back across the years, that toy piano doesn't seem so very important. But at the time the tragedy was a real tragedy. Looking back, across a number of to-be-written poems, the forgotten line of a poem that might have been won't loom so very large. But just today—well, I'm wishing, very hard, that I had stayed awake long enough to write it down!

Never, never, friends of mine, put off doing anything that there's any possible chance of forgetting—of not being able to do some other time! You'll find, if you do, that in most cases you do forget—that another time doesn't come, always. And though, after a while, the tragedy of the deed that you have left undone may not seem a very real tragedy, you'll never forget it.

I can laugh, now, and so can my little friend—who is no longer little—over the spoiled bit of doll's house furniture. But no other piano will ever, I reckon, quite take its place. And I'll laugh, too, over the line that I was too sleepy to copy down.

But I shouldn't wonder if, whenever I write a particularly nice bit of verse, I'll find myself saying—perhaps half unconsciously—

"If I could have remembered that line and made a poem out of it, it would have been better, I'm sure, than this one!"

Little Japanese Orphans Helped

ENCLOSED please find a receipt for $99.17, which was received by check in your recent letter. We appreciate the Christian Herald's kindness in forwarding these gifts, and that appreciation can only be realized by the fact that eighty-five little youngsters are being given a chance to live, with a few of the privileges that the world has to offer; the result of these gifts from readers of the Christian Herald. Since the beginning of the year the Orphanage has continued to run short fifty dollars or more each month because of the great rise in the cost of everything, but one of the missionary ladies, who has a woman's society in a church here, decided to have a strawberry, ice-cream, chicken and waffle social. Though nothing of the kind had ever been held in Sendai, the city took well to it. About $250 was cleared for the Orphanage, but more important is that the most important people of Sendai were brought in touch with the Christian forces of the city.

The Call to a Life of Service

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

FOR our autumn studies we turn back, far back, to the very beginnings of the Hebrew religion, and to Abraham, Father of the Faithful, the first great significant pioneering spirit in the Bible story. Oftentimes have most of us read this old-world tale, but with new point and meaning, taking color from the experiences of our own lives or of those in whom we are interested. Abraham's journeyings meant more to us when we as growing children became familiar with the story of the Pilgrim Fathers of our own nation, seeking freedom and opportunity in a new and distant realm. They meant still more when we began to realize that "we are strangers before Thee and sojourners, as were all our fathers." But this fall the call of destiny must ring clearer still. For we are witnessing the tramp of millions over the earth, and our own brave boys have left our churches and homes to go forth at the call of the nation. Over seas they have journeyed, the Mayflower turned back again, to take freedom to the Old World from the New. They have gone to strange places to deliver and to bless, "not seeking anything for themselves."

Selfish vs. Unselfish Motives

In the light of today's happenings how petty and unworthy seem the selfish and materialistic plans we used to make a few years ago! Will it not be easier after the "selective draft" and "universal service" to look upon all human life as under call, as not to be held selfishly dear, but to be freely offered up upon the altar of God? The manhood of our nation has said to the government, "I'll go where you want me to go, I'll do what you want me to do." Will we not say as much to our Heavenly Father when after the war is over we plan our civilian lives afresh? It seems to me there should be a hundred thousand ready recruits for Christian missions and unselfish service "when the boys come home."

We all believe that God speaks to us even as he did to Abraham. He heard God's challenge ringing through his soul. "God has spoken to me" is the Oriental expression to this day. We prosaic Westerners are more apt to speak vaguely of a "sense of duty" or, as one of our lads said to his father, "I must enlist, it's up to me." Everywhere God is speaking now; hearts are burning; boys of seventeen and men of fifty are moved to break old ties, to attempt unheard-of journeys, to go to the rescue of a suffering world.

Do you think it was easy to leave the associations of a lifetime for the hardships of the desert and the limited comforts of the rugged tablelands of Palestine? No selfish motive there! And so today, the young people leaving our country towns at the call of the city, the business men going to France with the Y. M. C. A., are not thinking of self-interest at all. Rather they, like Abraham, are consciously or unconsciously seeking first the kingdom of God and his righteousness.

The True Source of Blessedness

The repeated assurances of blessings to come through the great renunciation and the hard pilgrimage given in this tale of Abraham are the first faint notes which become as grand and full as an oratorio in the Sermon on the Mount. Abraham was the first to learn clearly that true blessedness lies in being a blessing. "Be thou a blessing" was God's will for his career. In fulfilling it he became the friend of God and "Jehovah appeared unto him."

"In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed." What an inspiration! A blessing to the whole world! What a sense of exaltation it must have brought to the wanderer in his moments of communion with the Unseen! What an inner peace! So it is still and has been in countless lives of sacrificial service to God's Kingdom, and in these strenuous days many of our soldiers have testified to the same conviction and a like exaltation.

Such thoughts are teeming in the minds of men all about us. New ideas, new inspirations are thronging in upon us as they must have thronged in upon Abraham in his black tents on the Aramean plain 4,000 years ago. Their religion was born and phrased in terms of service, of sacrifice, of obedience to the Unseen. No wonder that the faith of the whole world goes back to the man who left Ur of the Chaldees to walk by faith and not by sight. And shall there not in our time be a new birth of a real, essential religion in the earth, independent of creed and rite and ceremonial, based upon an urgently felt call to service and a mighty conviction of an Unseen Guide?

The Call to Be a Nation

Notice that Hebrew religion was always profoundly social in its conception. Abraham went not alone. He was called to serve "others," even the families of the earth. He was to found a nation! The whole Bible sings of a Commonwealth, of a Blessed Community, of a Kingdom wherein dwelt Righteousness. "I will make of thee a great nation" is considered the supreme promise to the obedient servant. The Bible history is the tale of the effort the blunders and the successes of the people of Israel. There have been times when Christianity seemed too individualistic to appreciate nation-building too unworldly to be patriotic as were the prophets, too theological to take account of the vast social problems mankind.

But in our day we are once more realizing that we are to build the Kingdom in our nation, yea, more than that, cooperate with God in blessing all the nations of the earth. We know now that another man named Abraham was truly religious when he began his great speech by saying, "Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth up this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created free and equal." In these days of tumult and testing our American prophets hear the voice of God saying, "I will make thee a great nation, and in thee shall the nations of the earth be blessed. Our nation hears and heeds the voice. She extends her hand to the persecuted and oppressed lands and promises help to make of them great nations."

The ancient convictions of the men of Israel were fulfilled. She served and blessed the whole world. Ever where men sing her Psalms and exalt her righteousness, holiness and faith which she, in the person of her truest representatives, discovered.

The present-day convictions of America as stated by her Christian leaders shall also be fulfilled. She shall find her own best future in leaving all selfish and materialistic considerations to Abraham, and going forth in faith to serve the world. In truth, even yet, we are like Abraham, going and knowing not whither we go! Who shall say the future will bring to our beloved land? But she hears and obeys the call of the Almighty. Truly her sons and daughters should hold their heads high in pride for their nation, and then bow them low in humble dedication, that individual lives may fit worthily in some useful niche in the great program for world deliverance.

A Pathway Marked by Altars

Wherever Abraham stopped he built an altar. Whether in Haran's fertile plain, or under the oak at Moreh, or the bare heights of Bethel, whether harassed by the Canaanite and the Perizzite, or journeying in peace through the southland, he constantly sought the guidance of his God. "Onward, ev-ward" was his motto; but it meant Onward with God."

But Israel is not the only people who can trace their founders by their altars. In a certain Sunday school there are three significant pictures that mark three stages of American History: "The Pilgrims Going to Church," "Washington at Valley Forge," and Lincoln's Cabinet Meeting at the Turning-point of the Civil War, "Gentlemen, Let Us Pray." I wish every Sunday school teacher would draw this parallel with the altars of Abraham. Then ask about the altars of America today. Her chaplains doing Christian service in every regiment. Her Y. M. C. A. and Knights of Columbus and Salvation Army in the very dugouts at the front. Her great hosts at prayer on Memorial Day and Heroes' Day, and soon in solemn consecration a new and holy observance of Thanksgiving Day different from any we have known before. For we shall not be giving thanks for teeming harvests for ourselves and groaning tables for our families. We shall be giving thanks that we have been made a blessing to all the families of earth, for a chance to join with Christ in redeeming the world, certain that if we suffer with him we shall also be glorified. We shall still rejoice in God's material gifts, but our rejoicing will be greater and loftier, for we have these gifts to share and are sharing. The whole nation will be saying,

I thank thee, Lord, for strength of arm
To win my bread,
And that beyond my need is more
For friend unfed.
I thank thee much for bread to live;
I thank thee more for bread to give.

In such a spirit as this we can as individuals go beyond the conceptions of Abraham, having learned of Jesus. Shall we not one and all repeat with holy joy these further words,

I thank thee, Lord, for lavish love
On me bestowed;
Enough to share with loveless folk
To ease their load.
Thy love to me I ill could spare,
Yet dearer is thy love I share.

Training Young People for Missionary Service

MY experience is that if you put up a real piece of work to young people, and then show them how to do it, they will make good. Lots of young folks want to be doing worthwhile things but don't know how. It is for us to show them how.

Let me suggest a real practical plan for training these young people for missionary service in the Sunday school.

Appoint as your missionary committee from three to five young people. Then appropriate from your school funds from $10 to $25 for the needed equipment for the committee.

They should have several of the following books to be read by them to inform them as to missionary methods, principles, and plans for raising missionary interest:

"Graded Missionary Progress" (Ferris). "Five Missionary Minutes" (Trull). "Missionary Methods for Sunday School Workers" (Trull). "Missionary Education for Juniors" (Hutton). "Things to Make" (Hutton). "Missions in the Sunday School" (Hixon). "Missionary Programs and Incidents" (Trull).

The next thing is to subscribe on behalf of a committee for copies of some up-to-date missionary magazines so that they may obtain missionary pictures and material for programs. I would suggest:

Two or more copies of "World Outlook" ($1.50 each), 150 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Two copies "Missionary Review of the World" ($2 each), 156 Fifth Avenue, New York.

One copy "Everyland" ($1.50 each), 156 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Then subscribe for one or more copies of the Christian Herald, for its illustrations of life in foreign fields and its excellent articles about life in foreign lands and its missionary incidents. Now what shall the committee do with this material?

From the Outlook, Review, Everyland and Herald they can cut out all of the illustrations, cutting life and work on the fields. And then sort the pictures according to fields both home and foreign. They will thus get together all the pictures concerning China, Japan, Korea, Philippines, India, South America, immigrants, Indians, foreigners in America, etc.

The next step is to place in a scrapbook under China, Japan, etc., all of the missionary stories, facts, geography, concerning medical, industrial and educational work they can gather and cut out from these magazines and can obtain from the missionary issues of the denomination. With each new monthly issue of these they will add to their store of material.

Now the committee is ready for business. Let Japan be selected for the first month's missionary subject. The committee will get some squares of cardboard, red or blue or gray or white, about 2 or 2½ feet square. On these pin the pictures of Japan, arranging them as to character and placing them on the cardboard artistically. If the committee fills as many as five boards for one field, place one in each department or class, choosing the pictures of Japan child life for the Beginners and Primary, and grading up the pictures until for the Seniors you would select the educational or medical or social service work. Place names of subjects on the boards and then hang them where all can see them.

The next thing is to select for the program the material suited to each department or class, or for the school as a whole if it is small, making sure that the material suits the age. For instance, dress a Junior boy in a Japanese kimono and let him tell the story of boy life in Japan. A Senior can tell about Japan's educational and medical and industrial life. Some one will tell about the Mission and Sunday school work there, and the pictures will be referred to as illustrating the country and its work and people.

The next month a home missionary subject will be selected, then another foreign field, until a year's program has been carried out.

Then plan for a week evening a rising missionary rally. Bring together all the fine sets of illustrations and arrange them about the room. Get from your Missionary Board stereopticon slides illustrating the fields. Have the boys and girls in costumes, one at least from each field covered in the year, and have them give in turn some impressive fact of the field, especially showing what the denomination is doing in that field.

The cost of these plans will be trilling against the real results obtained in training the young people on the committee and in some real teaching of missions to the school.

A letter to a soldier should show his rank, his full name (including his middle name), his company or battery, his regiment, and the branch of service to which he belongs.

A letter to John Walter Smith, Jr., private, Company L, 102nd Regiment of Infantry, should be addressed as follows, the name and address of the sender being placed in the upper left hand corner of the envelope:

Brush Teeth In This Way for a Week

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

Watch the Film Go

Dental science has obtained a new and better method of teeth cleaning. Able authorities have proved it by clinical tests.

It is now embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And we offer you a One-Week tube to show its unique results.

Its object is to end the film on teeth—the cause of most tooth troubles—that slimy film which gets into crevices and stays, and which resists the tooth brush.

That film is what discolors—not your teeth. It hardens into tartar. It holds food which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So that film is the great tooth destroyer.

Old methods of tooth brushing fail to end film. That is why brushed teeth discolor and decay. This new method does remove it, and we urge you to prove it by a simple one-week test.

A New Dental Era

Dental authorities have watched the Pepsodent action in thousands of cases. Years of proving show that this product marks a new dental era.

It is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object is to dissolve the film, then to constantly prevent its accumulation.

Old methods for using pepsin were impossible on teeth. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid which destroys enamel.

But modern science has discovered a harmless activating method. Five governments have already granted patents. That method is employed in Pepsodent. And it solves the problem of this film as nothing else has done.

The result is a dentifrice which, authorities say, must supersede the old kinds. You will know that when you try it.

Send the coupon for a One-Week tube. Use it like any tooth paste and watch results. Note how clean your teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the film. See how teeth whiten as the fixed film disappears.

Those results are essential to your teeth's protection. You will want them always when you see them once. Cut out the coupon now.

Put Your Dollars Into Khaki

ON the twenty-eighth of this month, the American who stays at home is going to be asked once more to go over the top. The loyal citizen who was too fat or too thin for the draft, or doing something too necessary for national welfare to allow him to quit and bear arms, is to have a chance to fight—to pelt the Kaiser with his dollars.

In other words, the Fourth Liberty Loan is at hand. A three weeks' selling campaign will open September 28. On that day every man who believes as President Wilson believes, as General Pershing believes—as every last dough-boy in the trenches and the training camps believes—is expected to back his ideas with American gold which talks louder and more convincingly than any tongue spoken today, including German.

The new Liberty Loan is going to be a big one. It can safely be announced that America will subscribe more on this occasion than in any previous loan. America needs more than at any time since it entered the war.

That the needed sum will be subscribed and oversubscribed, the officials in charge of placing the bonds do not doubt for a moment. Never was a Liberty Loan launched at a more auspicious moment. The Canadian name, "Victory Loan" might well be applied to this issue of government bonds.

Since the third bond issue was subscribed, the American people have had opportunity to see their victorious army, with the armies of our Allies, sweeping the common foe from France. Every tradition of our army and navy has been upheld, and the boys who have gone to France have set new marks in valor and heroism which will be the boast of America for years to come.

With Hindenburg shooting the chutes that will drop him into the Rhine—at a time when the Kaiser is telling his duped subjects that this is a "war of defense," forgetting some recent assertions diametrically opposed to that idea—while the two Crown Princes are blaming each other and another imperial chancellor is footing down Unter den Linden looking for a new job—why shouldn't the American public invest its savings in the safest security in the world?

There is another factor which loan experts and bankers everywhere agree will greatly aid in the sale of Liberty Bonds at this time. The men of America between eighteen and twenty-one and thirty-two and forty-five have been called to the colors. Never before in the history of this nation have so many home-keeping hearts realized keenly the needs of an army.

THE new loan comes in a day when Father is going to war along with Son. Every wife and mother, sister, aunt and cousin can visualize the needs of this pair—the socks they wear out, the warm things they must have on winter nights, the shoes, the coats, the guns to keep them safe from the Huns. And because of a thorough campaign of education it is now widely known that Liberty Bonds are sold to provide these things for our fighters. The statisticians who have figured out bonds in the terms of clothing, shoes and equipment will have a more eager circle of readers this Fall than ever before.

For Our Friends in the Fight

ALL of us have friends in the Great War, fighting on the side of righteousness, justice and freedom.

They are ready to lay down their lives for us who remain to carry on the daily work of the nation. They face unshrinkingly the dangers of the deadliest War of history. Some have already made the supreme sacrifice, and gold stars on the service flags mark their devotion.

True friendship involves obligations as well as confers privileges. The men in service are discharging those obligations.

Are we keeping pace with them, service for service, duty for duty?

These friends of ours over there need our help now—need it in the most critical emergency of their lives. They need our unswerving devotion and loyalty, and they need our dollars. The government which they and we support asks us to subscribe to the Fourth Liberty Loan in order to carry the war along to a victorious conclusion. This is not much to ask; it is not much to give. When our friends are spending their blood, it is a slight thing for us to spend our spare dollars to back them up. We can and ought to do more than that. We should purchase Liberty Bonds with our spare dollars, and we should arrange our affairs so that we have more money to spare for that purpose.

It can be done by taking thought. Luxuries can be cut off and our ideas of necessities readjusted. Friendship is not worth much if it will not stand some inconvenience, some hardship, some sacrifice for its preservation. It is the severity of the pinch which tests its quality. If it pinches us to take the new bonds, we should take them the more gladly, because by that fact we testify to the worth of our devotion to these friends of ours in service who stand ready to bear such burdens for us.

With all these assurances of success for the loan to cheer them, the Liberty Loan Committees of the various Federal Reserve Districts are sparing no pains to bring bonds to the attention of investors. A more comprehensive selling campaign than any previous one is to be inaugurated on the first day of the three week sales period.

The work of experts in the various departments of selling, advertising and general publicity and the voluntary assistance of thousands of patriotic citizens, including famous writers, speakers and public men of all descriptions, promise to make the closing days of this month more than interesting.

A Week in the World's News

WON'T TAX LIBERTY BONDS. Secretary McAdoo, on Sept. 10, asked Congress to enact at once legislation extending the exemption limits from income tax, surtax and excess profit tax of the income derived from the interest on Liberty Bonds. The Secretary's recommendation was that the interest on not more than $30,000 of Fourth Liberty Bonds owned by one person or firm should be exempt from tax and that in addition the interest upon a total of $45,000 of the First, Second and Third Liberty Bonds should be exempt. The Secretary also recommended that the law governing the sale of War Saving Stamps to be changed to permit the rate of $4,000,000,000, the present limit being $2,000,000,000. The House on Sept. 13 passed a bill enacting into law the exemptions suggested.

ARMED SHIP SINKS SUBMARINE. The captain of an armed tank steamer, reaching an American port, early in September, reported the sinking of a large submarine, on Sept. 3, in a gun duel with the tanker.

THE ELECTORS NOMINATE PATRIOTS. In Primary elections, on Sept. 11, Congressman Medill McCormick was nominated for United States Senator in Illinois over Mayor William Hale Thompson of Chicago. Mr. McCormick made his appeal on a "Win the War" platform. In Georgia William J. Harris, ex-Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, won the Senatorial nomination, defeating the present Senator, Thomas W. Hardwick, whom the President had characterized as "A constant and active opponent to my administration."

2,800 ESCAPE TORPEDO. The British ship, Persic, carrying 2,800 American soldiers to England, held behind her convoy by engine trouble, was torpe-

LIBERTY Loan campaigns in the degree. They have taken on a carnival aspect at times, for it is typically American to tackle cheerfully and even smilingly the grim business of war. The privilege of loaning money to the richest nation in the world is not a common one, and there is good reason to celebrate the opportunity. This fall there will be plenty of celebration.

This fall additional emphasis will be placed on the educational feature of the selling campaign. In New York City a genuine novelty is promised. Through the efforts of a huge corps of volunteer workers it is planned to mail an actual door to door canvass of New York's millions previous to the sale of bonds. The purpose of this canvass will be to acquaint prospective buyers with the nature of the goods.

It may seem bizarre, yet it is a fact that the Liberty Loan Committee has discovered a considerable number of Americans who are still ignorant of the investment value of government bonds. There are patriots in the United States who have given their savings for these bonds and never expected to see their money again. They have looked upon their purchases as contributions toward the war and their coupon books as a sort of diploma of rectitude. They had no idea that those cute little coupons with the perforated edges could be traded twice a year, for real money that the bond itself, in time of need, would be eagerly accepted by any bank as collateral for a loan; that the precious paper could be registered as a protection against theft and loss!

THOSE are some of the things the volunteer educators are going to do in their door to door visits. Relying upon the demonstrated patriotism of Americans of ranks, Liberty Loan officers know that bonds can be sold, but they deem it part of their duty to see that those who buy realize fully just how fine a gilt-edged investment they have made of the funds.

The sale of Liberty Bonds is a vast and complicated business that calls for sales ability, ingenuity and tireless effort. It is much to the credit of America that the great loans have been floated almost entirely by voluntary effort of patriotic folks in every walk of life.

Remember September 28. Buy Liberty Bonds and help win the war.

doed, Sept. 6, some 200 miles off coast of England. The vessel remained afloat and was beached. The men on board escaped by sliding down ropes to destroyers. No Americans were injured. Depth bombs dropped by the convoy destroyers were thought to have counted for the submarine.

DEBS FOUND GUILTY. Eugene Debs, four times Socialist candidate for President of the United States, was found guilty in Cleveland, Ohio, Sept. 12, on three counts of violation of the Espionage act. He was accused of uttering in a speech, at Canton, Ohio, language intended to incite, encourage and provoke resistance to the United States and to promote the cause of the enemy. Mr. Debs declared the sentence truthful and the court fair, and refused to make a defense. He was sentenced to serve ten years in prison but was allowed liberty on bail pending an appeal.

Concrete Roads and Eleven Cent Milk

Concrete pavement on Janesville Road, Milwaukee Co., Wisconsin

In Milwaukee, milk costs 11 cents a quart. In most cities it is 13 cents or more. This means a saving in the annual milk bill of a city of 450,000 people, consuming 185,000 quarts a day, of over $1,000,000.

There are three reasons for 11 cent milk in Milwaukee:

(1) Well organized distribution; (2) Ample milk supply; (3) LOW COST OF HAULING.

All three are a natural sequence of an excellent system of 129 miles of concrete highways leading to the city. Only a small portion of the milk supply comes in by rail. Most of it is hauled over concrete roads. Not only have these roads materially lowered the cost of hauling milk to market, but they have also materially extended the source of supply. Plenty of milk is made available at a low price to the consumer.

Read this statement recently made by G. R. Rice, Genl. Mgr. Milwaukee Milk Producers' Assn.:

"Here was a time when 15 cans of milk made a good load for a team of horses, and it was impossible to run trucks. Now milk is being hauled by truck, and the load runs from 50 to 100 cans. It comes in daily without trouble after once getting on the concrete roads.

The output of milk may not have been affected by the cement roads, but the cost of getting it in is much less and the time of delivery is shortened; consequently the milk arrives in much better condition, and the loss from souring is much less."

Also this by John Le Feber, Pres. Gridley Dairy Co., the largest milk concern in Milwaukee:

"Formerly milk was drawn in by horse and wagon. Now it comes by motor truck, which would be impossible over the old dirt roads.

I can not say exactly how much less per can the price is than in former years. Considering the enormous increase in all hauling costs, it's at least 25 per cent. Milk hauled by team used to get in from two to three hours later than it does now by truck, on a 20-mile haul. This in itself is an enormous saving. In hot summer months and in cold winter weather, it is much better preserved by quick delivery.

Where one man formerly with two horses (which had to be changed every other day) hauled about 40 cans a day, now a two-ton truck will haul about 100 eight-gallon cans, making two trips instead of one.

Concrete roads have encouraged the farmer to produce more milk; it is easier for him to haul his feed, of which he usually has to buy a lot outside.

I can not see a larger benefit to the State of Wisconsin than in continuing the wonderful work it has already done in concreting its roads."

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

THE fall has come in a burst of red-and-gold splendor. In the city parks the leaves are ablaze with flame tints, and the paths (on Saturday mornings) resound once more with the shrieks of rosy-cheeked children at their play. On week days these little folk are to be seen scurrying schoolward along the streets, their arms full of books, their heads full of eager plans.

What a welcome sight they are! And how glad we plodding elders are to have them back in town!

With the reappearance of the children we grown-ups become aware of a new freshness in the air. Our backbones stiffen. Our lungs expand. Our tired "summer" grimaces become smiles. We find ourselves calling out cheery good-mornings to every one, not forgetting the children, as we hurry by.

Indeed, we could not possibly forget the children; for they are everywhere. The streets teem with them, especially in the neighborhood of the schools. And as we thread our way through chattering groups of boys and girls, we overhear fascinating plans for the fall: talk of all-day hikes and dramatic clubs and art exhibits and school sings, and what not! Astonished, we hurry on, wondering when and how school life was changed from the tedious round we remember, to this splendid, broad, colorful life.

Perhaps the question remains unanswered. Or it may be answered, after a fashion, by some child. But if we are very lucky, it is answered for us by the one person who really knows: some young school teacher with dreams in her eyes.

We are apt to encounter her almost anywhere, although a very likely place is on the early morning train. We cannot possibly mistake her, nor is it difficult to draw her out. She talks freely and joyously, explaining what she dreams of doing this fall to develop her pupils and the school district; and we listen with earnest respect. She makes us see the school in a new light. She explains what the school ought to mean to the community, and what every teacher should mean to her school. Her face glows as she talks.

Are all American school teachers like this, we wonder?

WE investigate, and we find out that all American school teachers are like this, even out in the loneliest little mountain hamlets. Everywhere, despite almost overwhelming obstacles, our teachers are introducing progressive ideals into their schools and communities. Sometimes this is the slow work of years; sometimes—as in the following instance—it is brought about more or less quickly:

Helping School and Community

As school days now are beginning again, and many teachers are planning their fall work, I want to tell of an experience I had, two years ago, in a rural community.

Very few of the families there were interested in educational welfare. The girls were rude, thoughtless, and indifferent to everything but boys. The boys were—worse! It was my first year of teaching, and the prospects were all but disheartening.

The first month I organized a "Pollyanna Club" for the girls. There were only five charter members, as the club was restricted to those who made a specified average in school. By the second month the membership was doubled; and the gain in interest and enthusiasm for school was most encouraging. Everything but the name was kept secret. One of the requirements was that each member should report something done during the week to spread gladness. Some of the reports were quite unique. One little girl had gotten some unused chicken wire from her father and put it around an old lady's garden. Another had taken a fretful baby out for an hour every afternoon, giving its tired mother a much-needed rest.

We found a family of motherless children in an old shack. The father was recovering from serious illness and unable to work. A home was provided for the children with a woman who had been longing for children but "didn't know where to look." One girl's father took care of the man until he was able to work and support the children.

Somehow this new spirit on the girls' part had its effect on the boys. It spurred them to competition in school. Furthermore, the girls had unconsciously changed their own sickly sentimentalism to impersonal (though genuine) interest, and the boys responded to this changed attitude better than I had dared hope.

The Pollyanna girls formed a large percentage of the Sunday school membership, and entertained every two weeks, the girls taking turns at being hostesses.

But I think our most interesting results were with the little movie theater of our town. We arranged with the manager to show subjects particularly applicable to things we had in school—the English study books, especially, and fairy tales dramatized for the younger children. Then I gave extra grades to all who attended and wrote up an interesting account of the film. When the manager noted the enthusiastic attendance, he was glad to show anything we suggested.

By the term end, the social atmosphere of the community had been changed almost entirely by this handful of young girls working out quietly what we had first started in a spirit of play.

"TEACHER," Texas.

This Pollyanna Club, neighbors, could be started by a parent as well as by a teacher, or an older girl could found it. If any of you would like to obtain further details about the club—how it was organized and conducted—I shall be glad to forward to this Texas neighbor your letters of inquiry.

OUR second account is also from the South, and is one of the finest adventures in neighboring I have ever received. This little teacher had not only great initiative but boundless courage:

Awakening Community Pride in School

A few years ago I accepted a position as principal of a two-teacher school in a rural community in southern Mississippi. When I visited the neighborhood shortly before the school term began, I found that the school building of two rooms was unfinished and unfurnished. The previous principal had taught in a church near by, while the assistant taught in the schoolhouse, one room of which contained an old rusty stove and a worn blackboard: the only articles of furniture belonging to the school.

The children sat on long homemade benches borrowed from the church. They had neither desks nor tables. These benches had to be returned to the church each Friday before the monthly preaching service, and were carried back to the schoolroom the following Monday morning.

I found the permanent residents of the district involved in a feud of long standing. The remaining patrons of the school were tenants, who seldom remained more than one year on the same farm and were either indifferent to school matters or felt unable to cope with the situation.

After repeated failures to get the trustees and men of the neighborhood to better conditions, I began teaching in the schoolhouse, refusing to use the church. Shortly afterward my assistant and I prepared a short program to be rendered by the children, and invited the parents to visit the school. Only a few mothers responded; but something said that day inspired them with a wish to help us, and before we parted we had organized a School Improvement Society of five members.

With the aid of these faithful women we recruited new members and gave an entertainment at which we cleared over twenty-five dollars. Later, by a "George Washington Supper," we added to our fund; and with the amounts thus earned we purchased lumber enough to partly ceil the two rooms, there being nothing but the weather-boarding and shingles to keep out the rain and cold.

The men now had become interested, and offered to meet and work on the house if the ladies would furnish dinner. This was done and almost every family in the community was represented at the "working"; and the spirit of unity grew apace.

After the close of the five-month term, we kept up our society meeting and gave several entertainments during the long vacation. We also won a prize of five dollars by our school float at a May Day parade in our nearest town.

Before the close of my third session in the school, we had ceiled the house, replaced a number of broken window-panes, built new floors for both rooms, bought stovepipes, brooms, a porcelain water-cooler and patent desks. We also had had a well bored and bought a rope and well bucket. One of my friends and her husband donated window shades for all the windows and also a water bucket. We made two small tables for the teachers and decorated the walls with some beautiful and interesting pictures from Christian Herald covers. Then we had two very attractive rooms of which both children and patrons were proud.

Miss B. M. M., Mississippi.

WE now come to an adventure which, if less startling than the last one, probably had as profound an effect on the pupils and the community

Handling Quarrelsome School Children

I am intensely interested in the Neighboring Department in the Christian Herald, and believe some of my experiences with children belong there.

Some years ago I was teaching an ungraded country school, where the distance of the homes from the old schoolhouse made it necessary for teacher and pupils to remain there from nine o'clock until four each week day except Saturday once in two weeks.

There was a long noon hour, for eating lunch and playing. This the children filled with the games.

Many of these children were affectionate, impulsive and quick-tempered; so the playtime was often a time of bitter quarreling and fighting. To prevent this by fear of punishment would have been to make clean only the outside of the cup and platter. I wanted an influence that would help those children coming years to be better men and women.

The Testament was an authorized text book in all schools then, and each pupil who could read had one. So one day I asked them all to take their books and find Matthew 5:9; at together we read the verse, "Blessed are the peacemakers," a number of times, until the words were fixed in their minds.

A little explanation as to the difference made to those around us, whether we were peacemakers or persons who stirred up quarrels, followed the reading. Then I asked "Who wishes to be a peacemaker?" I think every hand was raised. I added a few words on practical ways to make peace, after which we went on with the regular school work again.

The result was surprising. If occasional some of the smaller ones began to quarrel during playtime, I only had to say: "Who are my peacemakers?" and the others would start some game, suggest some amusement, in some way take up the attention of the quarrelers, thus ending the trouble immediately.

HELEN A. HUTCHINSON, Maine.

With that adventure, neighbors, we shall have to close today's meeting to make room for the Forum.

AND now, before parting with you for another fortnight, I want to thank all of you for the beautiful letters and messages sent, in my care, to the lonely neighbors whose notices have appeared in my Forum. I cannot tell you how deeply touched I have been by the loving readiness with which you my Christian Herald comrades—has sprung to this service. I know that a single cheery letter or post-card sent to brighten some lonely life has gone unappreciated; even though it may be because of invalidism or failing eyesight, have gone unacknowledged.

Neighbors' Forum

I have a little plan by which my letters friends are made more interesting. I clip from the magazines and newspapers all poems and short stories I consider true to everyday life and when writing to a friend I enclose the story or poem best suited to the person and the trend of my letter. This would be a good plan when writing to soldier boys, thus making letters to them an inspiration and help.

Mrs. E. T. SHEPPARD

I would be willing to correspond with so lonely shut-in (preferably an old person) who desires to be written to.

IDA M. E.

If any one has any church music they could donate to a poor struggling country church they please write to Mrs. J. D. McGlasgow, Virginia?

We have in our community a Self-Defence Club having fifteen members. We meet on a month at members' homes. We have a president, vice-president, and secretary. Our motto is "Save and Give"; our colors are red and white. Each member denies himself something each month, and the money thus saved goes to the Widows and Orphans War Relief Fund. We also collect old linens and clothes to be sent to the National Surgical Dress Committee and to the Belgian Relief Fund. We have a roll call, each member responds with some item concerning the war.

All for Christ (Our Means)

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topics. 1 Tim. 6: 6-10, 17-19
(Consecration Meeting)

HERE are two ways of looking at the matter of Christian giving. One is to consider that what we have is our own, and to decide how much of this we shall give to God; and the other is to remember that all that we have is ours by the grace of God, as a gift to us, and to decide how much of these riches we shall use for individual purposes, for food, raiment and pleasure. If we make our decision on the second proposition we will find much more pleasure in giving, and will get much less criticism from those who share our faith than if we base our decision upon the first. The Jew was required to set aside a tenth out of the yield of his ground, or the increase of his flocks; and since the early government of Israel was a theocracy, this included both his contribution to the church and his taxes to the state. But the temple had also its box for freewill offerings, and many a Jew, who had paid his tithe, found the unmeasured goodness of God impelling him to further gifts. We today may safely feel that we are at least on scriptural ground when we give the tenth, but we now are impelled by grace and not compelled by law. Love is our measure and consecration our rule. "Jesus paid it all" is a common expression, but let us not forget the next line of the hymn, "all that I owe." Let us not forget either that all means everything; not what we can spare, not what pleases us, not what is necessary to make a good appearance, and let us not salve our conscience with gifts greater than some one else like circumstances with ourselves, even our hearts tell us that the gifts do not meet the debt we owe. It was said of a certain shoemaker, once upon a time, that he made a business of serving the Lord, and pegged shoes to pay his tithes. As Christians our great business is the extension of the Kingdom. Money foolishly spent or unnecessarily hoarded in those things which minister to our own pleasure may rise to plague us on that day when the book of records is opened and we face the righteous Judge, who will not fail to balance motives with acts, but who will be just in all.

Our Heritage from Early Home Missions

Epworth League Topic. Isa. 35

EVERY trip of Bishop Asbury over the bridle-paths of the Kentucky mountains, every meeting of the little prayer bands in Ohio, every trip of his lips in the wilderness beyond, was a Home Mission trip. From Asbury's time to the present, the Methodist circuit rider has been on the farthest fringe of advancing civilization. From the Alleghenies and the Blue Ridge to the Pacific our present Methodist numbers are an eloquent testimonial of the work of these home missionaries, who under hardship and facing manifold dangers were satisfied with meager fare so long as the Kingdom prospered. And as communities grew up about the little settlements, and prayer meetings in private homes and Sunday schools in schoolhouses developed into churches, thousands of these were raised from weakness to strength by the help of the Home Missions Society and the Church Extension Society, a powerful team for Methodist extension. There is scarcely a church in all the West whose history looks back for sixty or seventy-five years which was not founded upon the work of the home missionary, or some circuit rider or local preacher who fought famine, prairie and Indians along with his neighbors and never failed to hold aloft the fiery symbol of our all-conquering faith. As prosperity followed the pioneer and ordered civilization pushed the frontier westward, church after church outgrew its swaddling-clothes and began to stand upon its own feet, independent of the Missionary Society, sometimes much too independent (for such is the quality of our human nature that many a church helped by the Home Mission Society has in the years of its prosperity given meager returns in support for the work still going on to the westward). Nevertheless, the Home Mission Society has made every dollar serve the cause, and today in those regions where men still dare the virgin soil, or drive their prospecting shafts into the unknown depths of mountain ranges, the home missionary is yet about his task, still sacrificing, still fighting valiantly to found a new civilization upon firm faith in God.

The Prayer Meeting Topics for the six weeks beginning this week follow more or less closely the chapters in the League Home Mission Study Book for this year. It is recommended that the chapters become Mission Study classes for this period. The book is "Christian Democracy for America," by D. D. Forsyth and R. W. Keeler. It may be obtained from any branch of the Methodist Book Concern or from the central office of the League, 740 Rush Street, Chicago, Ill. The central office is also prepared to send supplementary help to leaders.

Flood Sufferers Grateful

THE Christian Herald's check for One Thousand Two Hundred and Thirty-five Dollars and Seventy Cents, representing flood relief contributions, is very thankfully received. It certainly will be the means of relief to many suffering ones.

There are large areas still under water where no crops can be sown this year. The people of these regions will need all the help that can be given them. The wheat harvest at the end of next month may relieve the stress somewhat, but there will still remain a great call for all we can do to keep many from starvation.

God's blessing will surely go with your generous gift. With the thanks of the Union Christian Flood Relief Committee of Paotingfu, I am, etc.,

FRANK A. FOSTER.

"Thank you," The colonel bowed his way from her presence. "The evidence is sufficient; the papers, which I do not understand, we have taken from the man; they are doubtless of great value. When the captain recovers he will find them in my care."

The next morning at daybreak a firing squad went out beyond the village. Mary Ellis did not hear the shots, for after a long anxious night she was sleeping exhaustedly, a smile on her tired lips. The doctor had spent the night with the patient, and toward dawn he had said that Jean Renault would live.

Canton's Great Bible School

ON a Sunday morning at 8:30 I stepped from a Pullman in the city of Canton, Ohio. It was drizzling rain. Knowing that it was but a few blocks to a certain noted church, and knowing the general direction, I started to walk the distance. Going up the street I noticed about a half block ahead was a whole family—at least there were man, woman and a couple of children. All were tripping along in the rain, and at the corner they turned in the direction I had in mind and I followed them. Soon I saw them turning into the building. It was the church building of the Christian Church, which is the home of the largest Bible school in the world.

A pleasant-looking gentleman was standing in the vestibule. As I started by he held out his hand, smiling. It was now about 8:45. Entering the auditorium I found it was already humming like a beehive. After I had sat down a gentleman came smiling, shook hands, and asked if I were a stranger; and in both voice and handshake there was a most hearty welcome.

The church building is a mammoth structure. In all it contains fifty-six rooms. The main auditorium will seat more than 2,500 people. The junior and intermediate department rooms can be thrown together—they are for the junior church service, and this makes a room larger than an ordinary city church auditorium. Some of the classrooms are as large as an ordinary church auditorium.

THE genius of this great organization is Rev. P. H. Welshimer, who is both pastor of the church and superintendent of the school. This man came to Canton about seventeen years ago. At that time the Bible school had an average attendance of less than one hundred and fifty. The church building was small and in a very poor location. Very soon the building would not accommodate the people. A new location was secured and a new church erected. This building was hardly completed until it was too small. In another year or two a large addition was erected but soon outgrown.

Finally the present location, which is in the heart of the city of Canton, was secured and a great building planned. By the time the foundation was completed the people realized that this building would be too small. The whole plan was rearranged, the foundation torn down and greatly enlarged, and the present structure erected. Although it is a mammoth structure, yet it is often inadequate. The enrollment of the school is 7,000, and on one occasion the attendance was 7,716.

Before discussing the methods used to build up such a school, let us return to the Sunday morning mentioned at the beginning of this article. While the orchestra was playing and the people were coming in at all entrances, the tall form of Mr. Welshimer was seen moving among the people. He seemed to be almost everywhere. In the meantime the song leader reached the platform and the choir loft was filling up with young people.

When the song service began it started like a great waterfall. Everybody in the great auditorium seemed to be singing. The old songs were chosen by the leader. Mr. Welshimer was not on the platform as yet. When it was time to read the lesson he appeared, and all were attentive. I am told that no one knows just what will be the order of the opening service. It is filled with surprises. When it is time to read no one knows who will read or how it will be done. In this case Mr. Welshimer read a paragraph and designated who would follow, and they kept reading until during a pause he designated another company. Sometimes it was the men, then the women, then the unmarried or one of the boys' classes.

While the classes were assembling, the orchestra played. In the balcony there are a dozen or fifteen classrooms, where when doors are opened the people face the pulpit, and in these rooms all that had to be done was to close the doors. Mr. Welshimer himself teaches the auditorium class. This class alone has an enrolment of nearly 2,000.

AT the close of the lesson study hour the orchestra played while the adult classes all reassembled in the auditorium. There was some special music and a couple of lively songs. While some announcements were made, the orchestra retired very quietly. By this time the choir loft was filled with young people. Every seat was taken. A song was announced by Mr. Crabtree, and the great pipe organ was played softly. This was the transition from Bible school to church service. There was no break whatever, and not a dozen people left the room.

THE story of the building up of this great Bible school is as interesting as any novel. It has taken a tremendous struggle. The problem in most schools is to get and hold the boys and young men. This live pastor found that it was simply impossible to get the boys and young men enough interested to attend regularly and stay through the entire service until the men were there. This leader therefore specialized on men. He made them understand that the church is the most important organization in their city. They might neglect their own business, but should they neglect the church they did it at their peril. More than eighty men are on the church board, and every one of them is an enthusiastic Bible school man. It is a sort of an unwritten law there that no man can be elected or retained on that church board unless he is an active worker in the Bible school.

If a man does miss a Sunday he is looked after at once. If he could come and stays away a few Sundays he is placed upon the home department and so notified. Strange as it may seem, he soon comes back.

They go after the men. Some years ago they visited one man in Canton forty-six times and he did not come. But on the forty-seventh time they landed him and he has been an active worker to this day. Mr. Welshimer is not the first man who saw that "you must use the man or you will lose him," but he is perhaps the first superintendent of a great school who actually gave to every one in every class a definite task. He says, "You bring in a fellow and give him some task, send him out to help somebody or to see a sick person, or to get some one else in the school, and when he becomes acclimated the very next step to take is to accept Christ and become a member of Christ's body."

Another mighty factor is real sociability. No school in the land makes more of this than does the Canton school. It has been said that no one can get into this school and out again without shaking hands with six people. This is not only true of the grownups but of the children as well.

These people make one feel at home. One may go into the building feeling that he is a stranger, but is sure to come out feeling he has been among friends, and he is sure to go back again.

Another important factor in this school is the faithfulness of the teachers. There are nearly a hundred of them, and one would no more be absent without complete arrangements for the absence than a bank cashier would be absent from his bank without arranging for it. A great deal, too, is made of the music. Never a service without special music. In fine weather in the summer I am told that the orchestra plays a half hour on the top of the building on Sunday morning, beginning at 8:15.

EVERYTHING is done systematically. In the church office two stenographers are kept busy all the time. It is like a great business institution. Each city block has people whose definite task is to look after it. If a family moves out of the block it is phoned to the office at once, and when a family moves into the vacant house, perhaps before the goods are unloaded from the dray, the people have one or more invitations to attend the Bible school at the Christian Church unless they are regular attendants at some other school. If children are found who have no clothes, the good women get busy at once and help the mother, supplying what may be needed. If one is sick, he or she is looked after diligently. If a scholar is absent, either by mail or phone or visitation he is looked after at once. A double card index system is used and the reason for the absence is noted on the card.

The contest idea is used almost continually. The Canton schools will contest a dozen schools in another city. Some years ago this one school had a contest with the twenty-six schools of the Christian Church in Chicago. This contest lasted five months. Telegrams were exchanged every Sunday, and the result of the day was announced at the evening service. On the closing day for a joke, Chicago wired Canton adding a number that made Chicago win. That evening Mr. Welshimer preached on the subject, "Victory Through Defeat." Canton didn't know until Monday that they had beaten Chicago, but they were just as jubilant before they knew it as afterward.

The average attendance of the Canton school during these five months was 3,111 per Sunday. The resident membership of the Canton Christian Church is more than 3,500. Every evangelistic meeting during the seventeen years has been held by Mr. Welshimer himself.

A Successful Career

A QUARTER of a century of successful teaching as the active administrative and executive head of Gale College, Galesville, Wis., the oldest educational institution of its kind in its part of the State, came to a close in June when Rev. L. M. Gimmetstad, president, severed his connection with the school. Dr. Gimmetstad plans to spend his declining years at Orfordville, Wis., where he will be the pastor of a Norwegian Lutheran church.

During his stay in Galesville, Dr. Gimmetstad increased the size of his congregation threefold, erected a new church which is free of all indebtedness and, besides, served as the president of the college, where he did much further the educational assets of the city in the matter of libraries, lecture and other things which add to the intellectual life. New buildings were added to the college, the courses were improved, and the class of instruction was bettered during his administration.

Dr. Gimmetstad was a leader in the civic life of the city. He was known in northwestern theological circles as a man of great constructive ability and leader in his field. J. E. DAHLGREN.

A National A B C Drive

OVER five and one-half million persons over ten years of age in the United States were unable to read and write in 1910. In 1917 there were registered for army service 700,000 men who could not sign their own names, could not read their orders, their mail of arms, or their Bibles; could not write letters home; and could not understand the cause for which they were fighting. The National Illiteracy Commission plans to utilize the entire school machinery of the United States in the task of teaching every man of drage to read and write before he is called to the colors. A successful experiment was tried in Kentucky, where on July 1, 1917, the State Illiteracy Commission had on record the name and location of every illiterate man of military age in the state. The moonlight schools were thrown open, and thousands crowded into the schools and learned to read and write before they were called to the colors on September 5. Alabama has commenced a similar drive.

Some Old-Fashioned Delights"

THAT is what the United States Food Administration Bureau, under whose parental guidance we work, calls certain sweets some of our young people may hear of now for the first time. We elders have grateful memories of the squares and rolls of fruit "leather" produced from the entries of grandmothers and their contemporaries at Christmas and other inter holiday seasons. In Charleston, C., and in other Southern cities, the industry of preserving late fruits in the form I shall describe today is still in vogue. Boxes of fruit leather and paste may be bought from confectioners, and are regarded by Northern tourists as quaint relics of auld lang syne. Our letter of advice from Headquarters thus prefaces the interesting topic:

Now is the time to revive such old-fashioned lights as "fruit leather" and "fruit paste." Serve these in winter, instead of candy, with cream cheese and nuts for dessert.

The suggestion is especially welcome now that the sugar shortage waxes to a crucial height. A goodly stock of fruit preserves, put aside against the day of need, which is likely to fall in midwinter, will lighten the mother's purse and supply her flock with confectionery at minimum prices when one compares them with those demanded by what old-fashioned folk, who taught how to make "leather and paste," would call "boughten candy." The fruit season is nearing its close. Do not let an apple, a pear, a late peach or a bunch of grapes be thrown away. judicious combinations of "delights."

Apple Leather

Peel, core and cut the apples into slices, or cubes. Mince, and rub through a colander into a bowl lined with clean cheese-cloth. When all are "pulped," lift the cloth by the corners and let it drip into bowl, to save the juice that will come away without squeezing. We shall see presently what to do with this juice. Shake, but do not press the cloth. The pulp must be soft, but not dry. Have ready large platters which have been lightly rubbed with saltless butter, or with perfectly sweet salad oil. Turn the pulped fruit into these in layers about half an inch thick, and set in the hottest sunshine you can find, moving the platters from time to time, to keep them in the full blaze of the sun. Take them in before the dew falls, and set in open ovens which have been heated moderately for some hours before they are opened. Two days of sunshine and two nights oven drying should make the "leather" or "paste" ready for packing. The contents of each platter should be carefully turned on the second morning, and the platter very lightly re-oiled. The paste must be perfectly dried. Choose bright, unseasonably warm days for the work. If you cannot utilize the sun's rays, set the dish all day in the open oven, and fan every hour for a few minutes to facilitate the process. When you have a dry, clean sheet of fruit, dust with powdered sugar over it, cut into squares or oblongs, and pack in tight boxes lined with waxed paper. Fit on the tops and keep in a cool, dry place.

Peach Leather

This is very good when made from the luscious "October peaches" that delight our senses in that most bewitching month—"the golden-mouthed St. John of the twelve apostles of the year." Pare and stone the peaches and proceed as directed in recipe for Apple Leather.

I would lay stress upon the fact that the fruits put up in this manner must be perfectly ripe. If they are a little over-ripe, remove the decaying parts with supple care, and use the rest.

The housewife who is so fortunate as to possess a "dryer," such as is used for drying corn, etc., will find the manufacture of the "old-fashioned delights" a mere trifle in consideration of the gratification to be derived from the consumption thereof when ripe fruits are out of season, and candied more profitably than ever.

Fruit Roll

Prepare as for "leather," until you are ready to cut it into squares. Instead of doing this, trim the edges of the sheet neatly, and sprinkle the sheet with sugar. Then roll as you would a cake for a "jelly roll"; press only into shape, with a sharp knife cut into other thick slices, and pack in boxes lined with waxed paper. The little rounds are more pleasing in appearance than the cubes, and perhaps taste better on that account.

Peach-and-Fig Paste

Make the peach-pulp as directed and add to it one-fourth the quantity of dried figs which have been softened by soaking in cold water, then wiped dry, and chopped fine. This is particularly nice.

Pear-and-Citron Paste

Peel and seed the pears and pulp as already directed. Before spreading upon the platters mix with it about one-sixth as much finely chopped citron-peel, then proceed as usual. Or you may substitute for the citron minced candied orange or lemon peel.

As I said just now, you may improvise other combinations of various fruits to enhance the "delight" prepared for the children—and not to be despised by their elders!

Now the promised word respecting the juices.

Bottling fruit juice is a very simple process.

The juice of berries, cherries, apples, pears, plums, peaches and watermelons may be bottled in their season. These juices make delightful summer drinks and sherbets, or they may be combined with fresh fruits in making gelatine desserts.

Wash bottles, place side down in a vessel and cover with cold water. Bring to a boil and boil fifteen minutes. Drain on cloth and fill with the juice. Sterilize corks by boiling in water fifteen minutes before using. Invert and drain on cloth.

Cut and crush large fruits, stem grapes, use berries as they are received. Heat slowly to simmering point. The flavor is finer if fruit is not allowed to boil.

Strain fruit through a cloth bag and allow the juice to stand in a cool place to settle.

Scald bottles and fill to within one and one-half inch of the top. Put in corks lightly, and set bottles on rack in a boiler, or tie down the corks and lay bottles on side with enough water to cover them. A screen or grating at the bottom of the boiler will prevent breaking. Heat the water to the simmering point (180 degrees) and keep at this for thirty minutes.

Remove the bottles, stand on end and dry the cork with a towel. When nearly cold, press cork in firmly and dip the top of the bottle in melted paraffin, or in sealing-wax. A simple method of sealing is to press the cork below level of neck of bottle and cover with sealing-wax.

Grape Juice

It should be better known that the juice of wild grapes, to be had for the picking by schoolboys on Saturday afternoons in the early autumn, makes a delightful and wholesome beverage when prepared according to rules here laid down for bottling fruit juices. Or—

Wash and pick over the grapes, throwing away the green and defective. Then crush in a pan or bowl with a potato-masher, or a clean wooden mallet, and put through a vegetable-press. If you have none, rub through a colander. Let the juice stand all night in a cold place to settle. Next morning, pour off from the dregs, and strain through doubled cheese-cloth. Bring to a slow boil; skim off what rises to the surface; boil five minutes and pour, scalding hot, into bottles already sterilized. This makes fine grape-jelly if combined with gelatine, and a refreshing drink in summer, iced, sweetened, and perfumed by a few stalks of mint floating on top.

"Let nothing be wasted," is a cardinal motto the year around. It is imperative now that what may be regarded as the aftermath of bountiful summer may be utilized to be used in the winter days that draw nigh.

An esteemed correspondent who writes from the "Land of Corn" contributes a practical recipe which fits in well with the topic we have discussed today, although it belongs of right to the talk about green corn that appeared here some weeks ago. There are still fields of corn of late planting that may supply material for salting down and canning. Every jarful thus saved for winter use is clear gain.

I am sending you my recipe for canning corn, which I have used for several years with great success.

Cut the corn from the cob, and to nine cups of corn add a half-cup of sugar and a half-cup of salt. Add very little water, and cook it as long as you would in preparing it for the table. When it is done put into jars while it is boiling hot, filling and sealing one jar at a time. I always boil mine in my granite dishpan. Stir frequently, as it burns quickly. I use patented self-sealing jars, and I hardly ever have any spoil. Freshen it before using, as it will be a little salty.—A READER OF THE CORNER (Oregon).

Use This Rule To Measure Food Cost

Food is measured by calories, the energy unit adopted by governments. The average person needs 2,500 calories per day.

Food cost depends largely on the number of calories you get for each dollar spent.

Among some of our best foods, at this writing, the comparison is as follows:

What $1 Buys in Food

In Quaker Oats, 20,000 calories	In Eggs, 2,310 calories
In Round Steak, 2,820 calories	In Leg of Lamb, 1,935 calories
In Young Chicken, 1,440 calories

One dollar spent for Quaker Oats buys as many calories as from $8 to $10 in meats.

Eight breakfasts of Quaker Oats can be served at the cost of one average meat breakfast, containing the same number of calories.

Quaker Oats, pound for pound, has twice the calories of lean beef. And 2½ times the calories of eggs.

Quaker Oats is also better-balanced than meats or eggs or fowl. It is one of the greatest foods we have.

Now-a-days, in millions of homes, it is the basic breakfast. And millions of housewives mix it with their flour foods.

Quaker Oats

Made from Queen Grains Only

The Quaker grade is made from queen oats only—just the big, plump, flavorful grains. We get but ten pounds from a bushel. That grade means extra flavor without any extra price. And you will get it if you ask for Quaker Oats.

Quaker Oats Bread

1½ cups Quaker Oats (uncooked)
2 teaspoons salt
½ cup sugar
2 cups boiling water
1 cake yeast
¼ cup lukewarm water
5 cups flour

Mix together Quaker Oats, salt and sugar. Pour over two cups of boiling water. Let stand until lukewarm. Then add yeast which has been dissolved in ¼ cup lukewarm water, then add 5 cups of flour. Knead slightly, set in a warm place, let rise until light (about 2 hours). Knead thoroughly, form into two loaves and put in pans. Let rise again and bake about 50 minutes. If dry yeast is used, a sponge should be made at night with the liquid, the yeast, and a part of the white flour. This recipe makes two loaves.

Quaker Oats Muffins

¾ cup Quaker Oats (uncooked), 1½ cups flour, 1 cup scalded milk, 1 egg, 4 level teaspoons baking powder, 2 tablespoons melted butter, ½ teaspoon salt, 3 tablespoons sugar.

Turn scalded milk on Quaker Oats, let stand five minutes; add sugar, salt and melted butter, sift in flour and baking powder; mix thoroughly and add egg well beaten. Bake in buttered gem pans.

Quaker Oats Cookies

Mix dry 2 cups Quaker Oats (uncooked), 3 cups flour, 1 teaspoon cinnamon, 1 teaspoon salt. Mix 1 cup sugar, 1 cup lard.

Put 1 level teaspoon soda in a small cup of sour milk. Add this to sugar and lard, then add dry ingredients, roll thin, cut in squares and bake. Raisins—2 cups—make an excellent addition.
